

MEMOIRS
OF THE
KINGS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

VOL. II.

MEMOIRS

OF THE

KINGS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

VOL. II.

5 L d

MEMOIRS
OF THE
KINGS OF GREAT BRITAIN

OF THE HOUSE OF
BRUNSWIC-LUNENBURG.

BY W. BELSHAM.

VOL. II.

Ac mihi quidem videntur huc omnia esse referenda ab iis qui præsunt aliis, ut ii qui eorum in imperio erunt, sint quàm beatissimi. CICERO.

LONDON:
PRINTED FOR C. DILLY, IN THE POULTRY.

1793.

7

MEMOIRS

OF THE

KINGS OF GREAT BRITAIN

OF THE HOUSE OF

VOL. II

As this volume contains the names of the Kings of Great Britain, it is necessary to insert the names of the Kings of France, who were contemporaries of the Kings of Great Britain, in order to show the connection between the two monarchies.

LONDON:

Printed for A. MILLAR, in the Strand.

1793

K. GEORGE II.

CONTINUED.

NOTWITHSTANDING the Treaty of Seville, concluded so long since as the year 1729, the Spaniards had never desisted from the commission of those insults and depredations, for the prevention of which it was chiefly and professedly made. They were even emboldened by the phlegmatic indifference, or pusillanimity, of the English Minister, to proceed to still farther extremities. They now therefore disputed the right of the English traders to cut logwood in the Bay of Campeachy, and to gather salt in the island of Tortuga, though of antient and established practice, and never before called in question. On pretence of the illicit commerce carried on by the

VOL. II.

B

British

British West India Islands with the Spanish Main—and which, however contrary to the absurd policy of Spain, was doubtless equally necessary and beneficial to both countries—armed vessels, known by the name of Guarda-Costas, were stationed in the usual track of commercial intercourse, which on the plea of searching for contraband goods, seized, plundered, and insolently detained, a great number of British merchant-ships at their discretion; and, without regarding the faith of nations, imprisoning the crews, and confiscating the cargoes. The repeated memorials presented by the British Ambassador at the Court of Madrid produced no sort of effect. Evasive answers, vague promises of inquiry, and cédulas of instructions sent to the Spanish Governors in America, intended merely to amuse, were all the advances which were made towards reparation and redress. The nation seemed at length fired with a general and just resentment at these outrages. Petitions were presented to Parliament in the session of 1738, from the mercantile towns and cities, stating the violences to which they had been exposed, and imploring relief and protection. The House, in a grand committee, proceeded to hear counsel for the merchants, and to examine evidence; in the course of which it appeared, that the most horrid and wanton acts of cruelty had in various instances been perpetrated by the Spaniards on the subjects of Great Britain.

Britain. One Jenkins, who appeared on this occasion at the bar of the House, gave a simple and affecting narrative of the savage treatment he had met with from the captain of a Spanish guardacosta, who, after exhausting his invention in various modes of torture, tore off one of his ears, and bade him carry it to his King, adding withal many contumelious and opprobrious expressions. Despairing to escape alive from the hands of this barbarian, he recommended, he said, his soul to God, and the revenge of his wrongs to his country. The House, scarcely less inflamed than the populace with this recital, voted an unanimous address to the King, "beseeching his Majesty to use his endeavors to obtain effectual relief for his injured subjects, to convince the Court of Spain that his Majesty could no longer suffer such constant and repeated insults and injuries to be carried on to the dishonor of his Crown, and to the ruin of his subjects—and in case his applications proved fruitless, assuring him, that the House would effectually support his Majesty in taking such measures as honor and justice should make it necessary for him to pursue." To this address, the King returned a gracious and favorable answer, and on the 20th of May 1738, the Parliament was prorogued.

Various motives concurred, nevertheless, to excite in the breast of the Minister an extreme reluctance tance firmly to resolve on a declaration of war. During the long course of his administration, it had been the constant and favorite object of his policy, to preserve the kingdom from that dire calamity. He perhaps doubted his talents for conducting a war with vigor and ability; and he might reasonably apprehend, that any disastrous event in the course of it might endanger his authority and safety. He was persuaded that the commercial interests affected by these depredations were in themselves too trivial, and of a nature too equivocal in point of right, to warrant the nation in having recourse to a remedy so violent. He well knew that the union of the two Crowns of France and Spain was so strongly cemented, that a war with one must inevitably involve us in a war with the other. And it was his invariable and avowed opinion, though contradicted happily by later experience, that England alone was not equal to cope with the combined force of the House of Bourbon. Possessed with these sentiments, he concluded, during the recess of Parliament, a CONVENTION with Spain, signed at the PARDO in Madrid; by which the King of Spain obliged himself to make reparation to the British subjects for their losses within a certain period; and commissioners were appointed "for regulating all those grievances and abuses which had interrupted the commerce of Great Britain in the American seas; and for settling thing all other matters in dispute, in such a manner as might for the future prevent and remove all new causes and pretences of complaint." When the terms of the Convention were communicated to the Parliament, which met February 1, 1739, it was treated with the most poignant contempt and ridicule. It was asserted by the opposition, that Spain, so far from giving up her groundless and unjustifiable claim of visiting and searching British ships sailing to and from the British plantations, openly insisted upon it as a matter of right; for it was merely the differences which had arisen in the exercise of this pretended right, and not the right itself, which they had submitted to discussion. So that the undoubted and indisputable rights of England, and the insolent usurpations of Spain, were referred to the mediation of plenipotentiaries, as resting upon the same basis of equality. It was observed, that if the ministry had made the resolutions taken by Parliament in the last session the foundation of their demands, a decisive answer must have been obtained; but this Convention, styled a treaty, was evidently no more than a preliminary to a treaty; and a most injurious and disgraceful preliminary. It was an expedient illusory and ignominious, insecure though abject: And an assertion was risked, which eventually proved indeed strictly true, that the expence of the commission would exceed the sum ultimately granted by Spain as an indemnification to the mercantile sufferers*. It was also objected that the regulation of the limits of Carolina and Florida was referred to the determination of these plenipotentiaries, so that the territorial right of the infant colony of Georgia, which indubitably belonged to the Crown of Great Britain, was left open to dispute, to the great and manifest discouragement of the settlers, who must deem themselves placed in a most precarious and dangerous situation. The Minister, whose equanimity of temper was rarely ruffled by the bitterest invectives, at length arose, and in a very able speech vindicated his own conduct, and the terms of this Convention, by arguments which merit a much more impartial and dispassionate attention than at this period of national delirium they could hope to obtain. "From the military glory of this empire, we are apt, said this cautious and sagacious statesman, to flatter ourselves that our arms are invincible; and the wars between England and Spain are particularly dazzling and fascinating to the imagination. We see great navies defeated, great treasures gained, and great glory acquired; and we have no lei-

* The sum allowed by Spain as an indemnification, a very inadequate one indeed, to the British merchants, was 95,000 l.; from which, under various pretences, such deductions were made, as reduced the balance to less than 20,000 l. The Convention was signed at the Pardo, January 14, 1739.

ture to reflect that the situation of affairs is at present entirely different from what it once was. Spain indeed has long ceased by its own unassisted strength to excite the dread and terror of Europe. But the very circumstance of its internal debility has been the means of procuring the support and alliance of Powers, in conjunction with whom it would be romantic to expect that it should not be able to defend itself against the most formidable attacks of England. We know that France, who is actually connected with Spain by the closest ties of policy and of blood, has at her command vast armies, fleets, and revenues; and to venture the honor and interest of the empire against such a combination of superior forces, would, without extreme necessity, be not only rash but criminal. I do not affirm that no such necessity can arise; but I affirm that no such necessity yet exists. France and Holland have never contested those claims which we profess to regard with such indignation, and of which it is pretended we ought to insist upon an absolute renunciation on the part of Spain, without even suffering them to become the subject of discussion. But in the lowest state to which Spain has been ever reduced, this claim, which from long prescription she no doubt thinks to be just, and perhaps essential to the preservation of her American empire, has been invariably maintained. Spain is a nation steady to her purpose, proud, fond of power, and even of the shadow of it—scrupulously attached to formal inquiries and discussions. Let gentlemen then lay their hands on their hearts, and say whether it were advisable to offer an insult so gross—or reasonable to expect compliance with a demand so imperious. No one, it is surely presumable, would have been better pleased than myself, had Spain thought fit to have given up this point by a clear and positive renunciation. But it is certain that the most successful war would scarcely have been able to extort this concession as a preliminary to a future treaty. But by this Convention a virtual renunciation at least is obtained—for Spain has consented to indemnify the subjects of Great Britain for the injuries they have sustained in consequence of her pretended rights as founded upon this claim. Surely then the administration of Great Britain must have been mad, had they desperately plunged their country into a war, while it was in their power to conclude a peace, of which this great, this decisive concession was to serve as the foundation. Was it for Great Britain to resolve to reject all concessions, and to hear of no other mode of terminating this difference than that of the sword? Could it be consistent with just policy to leave Spain in possession of a plea so plausible, so likely to interest all the Powers of Europe in her favor, as such a conduct must have inevitably furnished? Might she not have have said, "I have offered satisfaction, I have offered indemnity, I have offered a firm and faithful observance of treaties; but these offers have been refused; England therefore certainly harbors some deep and dangerous design, which it is the common interest of nations to oppose and counteract." Holland doubtless depends upon her commerce for her support and political importance, as much as ourselves. But I am convinced that the government of that country would not have indulged the complaints of private traders so far as to make a public inquiry, which might have occasioned an open rupture; nor would their Ministers have insisted on immediate satisfaction. They know too well that very great abuses are daily committed in the American trade. They know too well that the result of such inquiry might and would have been very little to their advantage. It requires no great art, no great ability, in a Minister to pursue such measures as might make a war inevitable. But as events depend so much on fortune, it is the part of a wise Minister to leave as little as possible to fortune. And the success which any former Minister has met with from the favor of fortune, is no reason why a succeeding one should tread the same dangerous and uncertain paths, when the same ends can be compassed in a way more safe and certain. I well know indeed that it is impossible for a Minister, let him adopt what mode mode of conduct he may, to satisfy those whose invariable maxim it is, that the Minister can never be in the right, and consequently that in their uniform opposition to all his measures they can never be in the wrong. Let us suppose that a war had been precipitately declared and vigorously prosecuted. Can we not easily imagine to ourselves that we hear a systematic opposition-man violently declaiming on the benefits of peace?—telling the world that a commercial people ought ever to avoid war, as destructive to their interests even when most successful? Fair and reasonable terms, he would exclaim, have been offered. Spain has even consented to indemnify our merchants for their losses. They have proposed an amicable meeting, to adjust all points in difference—yet our ministry, far from listening to advances so reasonable and equitable, have blundered us into an unjust, expensive, and hazardous war. This I confess would have been blundering—and for the first time perhaps in the course of such an opposition, the term would have been rightly applied. Future ages however, always impartial in their censure or praise, will, I am confident, do that justice to the counsels which have produced the Convention under our discussion, which passion and prejudice now refuse. And there is even reason to believe that a short time will remove those misapprehensions respecting it, which, in consequence of the clamors of artful and malicious

ous

ous traducers, so many persons of real sense, candor, and probity, have unhappily been led to entertain."—At length the question being put for an address of approbation to the King, as moved by Mr. Horace Walpole, it was carried in the affirmative, in a House consisting of 496 members, by a majority only of 28. The numbers being declared, Sir William Wyndham rose and remarked, "that the address was intended to convince mankind that the treaty under consideration was a just and honorable treaty—but if the people refused implicitly to resign their reason to a vote of that House, and a vote so circumstanced; will not Parliament lose its authority and influence with the public? Will it not be thought that the kingdom is governed by a faction, determined at all events to support the measures of the Minister? I shall perhaps, said he, trouble you no more, but my earnest petition to Almighty God is, that he will preserve this people—whom he has so often wonderfully protected, from the impending danger which threatens the nation from without, and likewise FROM THAT STILL GREATER DANGER WHICH THREATENS THE CONSTITUTION FROM WITHIN. Sir Robert Walpole was upon this occasion provoked, in bitter and passionate language, to recal to the recollection of the House, "that the gentleman who was now the mouth of his opponents, was twenty-five years before deeply engaged with those traitors who had conspired the destruction tion of their country : That the only use he had made of the clemency of government then extended to him, was to endeavor its subversion ; and he expressed his hope and confidence, that such treachery and ingratitude would produce an union of all true friends to our present happy establishment." Agreeably to the intimation previously given, a grand secession of the members in opposition took place during the remainder of this session, and the succeeding year Sir William Wyndham died, deeply regretted by the public at large, who had long forgotten his early political attachments, as one of the chief ornaments of the British senate and nation. In eloquence he had, by general acknowledgement, no rival but Mr. Pulteney. In the calm discussion of ordinary topics, he is indeed said to have been an uninteresting and ungraceful speaker ; but when warmed and animated with his subject, he displayed all the fire and force of a Demosthenes. In the House of Lords the opposition to the Court was no less formidable. The Prince of Wales divided in person against the address, and his example was followed by seventy-three Peers—thirty-nine of whom afterwards signed a protest against it, framed in terms of distinguished spirit and ability. Towards the conclusion of the session the House of Commons voted the sum of five hundred thousand pounds, for augmenting the forces of Great Britain in case of emergency. A motion

motion being made in the House of Peers by Lord Bathurst for an address to know whether Spain had paid the money stipulated by the Convention, the time limited for the payment being now expired; the Duke of Newcastle acquainted the House, that he was commanded by his Majesty to inform them that it was not paid; and that Spain had as yet given no reason for the non-payment—Upon which Lord Carteret moved, that the failure of Spain in this particular was a breach of the Convention, a high indignity to his Majesty, and an injustice to the nation. After a vehement debate the motion was evaded by the previous question. And June 14, 1739, the session was closed by a speech from the throne, in which the King assured the two Houses, “that he would not be wanting in his endeavors to vindicate and maintain the undoubted rights of the nation, and to answer the just expectations of his people.” Immediately on the prorogation of Parliament, letters of marque and reprisal were issued against the Spaniards. But the Minister still indulging a fond and lingering hope of averting that war, which was now become certain and inevitable, transmitted instructions to Mr. Keene, the British Envoy at Madrid, to declare that the King of Great Britain did not intend to be thereby understood to break the peace, or to deviate from the treaties subsisting between the two Crowns—and that he had it expressly in charge charge to assure the Court of Spain, that as soon as the Catholic King should be disposed to make the just satisfaction demanded of him, reprisals should cease, and give way to an accommodation. To which the Marquis de Villarias, the Spanish Minister, with great dignity replied in the name of his sovereign, "that the King of Spain neither acknowledged the right of the King of England to make reprisals, or to authorize others to make them—that his Catholic Majesty would regard these reprisals as a declaration of war, and that on the first intelligence of such act of hostility, Mr. Keene should have notice to leave the kingdom." Lord Waldegrave, the British Ambassador at Paris, having communicated to the Court of Versailles the resolution of the King of England, Cardinal Fleury appeared much moved—and styling it a terrible resolution, told the Ambassador that he sincerely deprecated the consequences which there was too much reason to believe would be found to result from it. The Cardinal however, in this crisis, offered as a last resort, through the medium of the French Ambassador in London, the mediation of France, in order to compromise the differences subsisting between the two Crowns; at the same time intimating that his Most Christian Majesty, in case of a refusal of his good offices, would be obliged to fulfil his engagements with Spain. To which it was replied by the English Court, that the union subsisting between tween

tween France and Spain was too strong to permit his Most Christian Majesty to act with perfect impartiality in such a mediation, and that this must be considered as a sufficient reason for declining the acceptance of it. Upon which the Ambassador declared his presence in London to be entirely useless, and his continuance probably of very short duration. If the Minister be justly chargeable with tameness and pusillanimity in the conduct of his long and tedious negotiations with Spain, it must be acknowledged that he seemed determined, by the formidable preparations both naval and military, which were now made, to carry on that war with vigor and effect, into which he had entered with so much hesitation and reluctance, and which would have been in all probability much more effectually prevented, by the early assumption of a bolder and more resolute tone, and the actual appearance of a powerful British squadron in the West Indies, than by the numberless querulous and garrulous memorials presented for a succession of years at the Court of Madrid; which appeared to deem it sufficient condescension to suffer the incessant repetition of the same unheeded tale. In the month of October 1739, war was formally declared against Spain: And Rear-admiral Vernon, a rough and resolute seaman, having been previously appointed to the command of the British naval force on the West India station, universal joy was excited by the

the important intelligence which arrived early in the ensuing year, that he had taken the city of Porto-Bello on the isthmus of Darien, with six ships only. Admiral Vernon received on this occasion the thanks of the House of Commons, and became the theme of the most extravagant panegyric. It was however remarked by some political cynics, that though the attempt was bold the resistance was feeble, and had it not been crowned with success by the caprice of fortune, the commander would have incurred very severe censure for making a display of his valor so much at the expence of his discretion. The talents of this officer were, in consequence of the glory acquired by this brilliant coup-de-main, thought equal to any undertaking. And one of the most formidable armaments which ever sailed from the harbors of Great Britain, destined for the attack of Carthage on the Spanish main, was entrusted to his care and conduct, with the highest confidence of success. The command of the land forces on board the fleet, on the death of Lord Cathcart, devolved upon General Wentworth; and it soon appeared that the leaders of this expedition were palpably deficient in the most essential requisites of their respective stations. Ignorance, rashness, and dissension, characterized all their operations: And after sustaining immense loss, not so much from the ill-concerted attacks made upon the town and its adjoining adjoining forts, as from the tropical diseases which raged amongst the troops, they were finally compelled to a precipitate and disgraceful retreat. And after reinforcements had been received from England, and the health of the men restored, nothing was attempted by the Admiral to retrieve his own reputation, or the honor of the British arms; and the nation began to be sensible that they had formed much too high an idea of his character*. A squadron under the command of Commodore Anson was detached into the South Seas, in order to annoy the Spanish settlements in that quarter. But from the harm sustained in the perpetual war of storms and tempests, rather than the opposition of the enemy, the primary design of the expedition proved abortive. The Commodore made however a great number of rich prizes off the coasts of Chili and Peru, which he long kept in alarm. Landing with a detachment of seamen and marines, he took and plundered the town of Paita, and the consternation excited by this enterprize extended even to the city of Lima; but his force was too inconsiderable to attempt any permanent conquest. In crossing the Pacific Ocean, he had the good fortune to meet with and capture a Spanish galleon, bound from Acapulco to the Philippines, of immense value; and returning by the Cape of Good-Hope to England, after a complete circumnavigation of the globe, was received with NATIONAL ACCLAMATION.

* Previous to the sailing of this great armament for Carthagena, the Court of Versailles again offered its mediation, declaring its willingness for this purpose to act in concert with the Courts of Vienna and Lisbon—but this offer was, probably with secret reluctance, rejected by the Court of London.

An event in which all Europe was deeply interested, and had some time past anxiously expected, at length took place October 20, 1740, in the demise of the Emperor CHARLES VI. the last heir-male of the House of Austria Hapsburg. And, in a few days after the Emperor, expired Anne Iwanowna, Empress of Russia, who bequeathed her crown to Iwan the infant grandson of her elder sister the Dutchess of Mecklenburgh. But this disposition not being agreeable to the Russians, a revolution soon took place in favor of Elizabeth, youngest daughter of Peter the Great by the late Empress Catherine, who adopted the same general system of policy with her predecessors, and governed that vast empire with the same uninterrupted success and reputation. Notwithstanding the famous edict styled the Pragmatic Sanction, of which such repeated mention has been made, and by virtue of which almost all the Powers of Europe had guaranteed the possessions of the House of Austria to the Arch-dutchess Maria Theresa, now assuming the title of Queen of Hungary, the death of the Emperor seemed as a signal to set the world in arms.

arms. Frederic King of Prussia,—who had a few months only previous to this event acceded to the throne of his father,—to the astonishment of the Court of Vienna, advanced a dormant and antiquated claim to certain districts of the Dutchy of Silesia; and in order to supply all deficiency of argument, he marched a formidable army into that province, and after a rapid succession of conquests made his public entry into Breslau the capital—the Queen of Hungary having rejected with disdain the offer he made to advance a large sum for her immediate accommodation, and assist her with all his forces against whatever enemies might arise, in order to obtain her consent to the cession of the territory in question. Till this period it is to be remarked, that Prussia had scarcely been numbered amongst the Powers of Europe; and had never been deemed of sufficient consequence to take any other than a subordinate, or secondary part, in the contentions of the Continent. It was not without long and urgent solicitation that the Emperor Leopold had consented to confer the title of KING upon the Marquisses of Brandenburg; and, as it is said, expressly against the advice and remonstrance of Prince Eugene, who warned the Emperor that he was raising up a rival to himself; and that the acquisition of the royal title would probably incite to future dangerous schemes and projects of aggrandizement *. The late King of Prussia was a man capricious, ignorant, and brutal. The relentless despotism which he exercised over his subjects led him to increase the number, and to pay the closest attention to the discipline, of his troops; and his insatiable avarice prompted him to the constant accumulation of treasure, gradually rising in a long succession of years to an immense amount, and procured by every species of rapine and extortion. And thus the new Monarch, who had sought for refuge from the tyrannic jealousy of his father in the shades of retirement, and who had strongly ex-

* The King of Prussia himself, with his characteristic frankness, says, "Frederic I. en érigeant la Prusse en Royaume avoit par cette vaine grandeur mis un germe d'ambition dans sa postérité qui devoit fructifier tôt ou tard." The King determined, as he tells us, on a mature consideration of the forlorn situation of Austria, whose finances were miserably deranged, whose armies were ruined by the late unsuccessful war with Turkey, and which was now governed by a young Princess without experience, under the additional disadvantage of a doubtful title—to assert what he is pleased to style his incontestable rights to Silesia. Though so chimerical did his claims appear to the Court of Vienna, that when, in consequence of the military preparations actually carrying on in the Prussian dominions, M. Damrath, the Imperial Envoy at Berlin, warned his Court that a storm was gathering which might possibly burst over that province, the Council of the Queen replied, "Nous ne voulons ni ne pouvons ajouter foi aux nouvelles que vous nous mandez."

Oeuvres de Frederic II.

cited

cited the attention of Europe, by an uncommon display of talents even in that obscure and sequestered retreat, now found himself in a condition to undertake the boldest designs which interest or ambition could suggest. The Elector of Bavaria refused to acknowledge the title of the Queen of Hungary, alleging that the kingdoms of Hungary and Bohemia belonged to him as the rightful heir of the Emperor Ferdinand I. The King of Poland, as Elector of Saxony, unmindful of his obligations to the late Emperor, claimed the whole Austrian succession in right of his mother, daughter of the Emperor Joseph. And France resolving to embrace the favorable moment for which she had long and anxiously waited, to abase the pride and annihilate the power of her antient rival, entered into engagements with the Elector of Bavaria, with a view to elevate this Prince to the Imperial throne, and to enable him, in concert with the Houses of Brandenburg and Saxony, to seize and divide the Germanic dominions of the House of Austria; the object of the confederacy being to confine the power of the Queen of Hungary within the narrow limits of that remote kingdom. Spain also, desirous of a share of the spoils, boldly advanced her pretensions to the Italian dominions of Austria: And the Queen of Spain, heiress of the House of Farnese, a woman of daring ambition, who gloried, like Catherine of Medicis, in styling herself the Mother of Kings, entertained the project of erecting these dominions into a Monarchy, under the title of the Kingdom of Lombardy, in favor of her youngest son the Infant Don Philip, brother to Don Carlos King of the Sicilies, who also became a willing party in this formidable confederacy against the Imperial House; in the general wreck of which, the Austrian Netherlands were allotted to France. The treaty of Nymphenburg was concluded in the spring of 1741, between France and Bavaria—a powerful army under Mareschal Maillebois marching at the same time into Westphalia, in order to over-awe the Electorate of Hanover. And the King of England, then at Hanover, thought proper to countermand the march of the Danes and Hessians in the pay of Great Britain, who had received orders to advance to the relief of the Queen of Hungary, and to sign a treaty of neutrality for that Electorate, as the purchase of which he engaged to vote for the Elector of Bavaria, at the ensuing election of an Emperor; although this great concession, by which the Imperial diadem was in appearance, and probability, for ever transferred from the House of Austria to that of Bavaria, was obviously and utterly irreconcilable with the general policy of England, which had for a long series of years considered the power of the Austrian family as the

the only effectual counterbalance to that of the House of Bourbon.

In July 1741, the Elector of Bavaria being joined by the French forces under Mareschal Broglio, entered the Arch-dutchy of Austria at the head of 70,000 men, and captured the important cities of Lintz and Passau. But understanding that Vienna was strongly fortified and garrisoned, he determined to direct his march to Bohemia; and Prague surrendering after a short resistance, the Elector made his public entry into that capital, where he was proclaimed King of Bohemia, and inaugurated with the usual solemnities. Notwithstanding this success, the Elector has been accused of egregious indiscretion, in suffering his attention to be diverted from the siege of Vienna, the conquest of which, exclusive of the lustre it would have reflected upon the confederate arms, must have materially obstructed the communication between the Germanic and Hungarian territories of the Queen; and in its consequences would probably have proved decisive. Nothing however had as yet interrupted the tide of his prosperity.

The Diet of the Empire being convened at Frankfort on the Maine, the Elector was unanimously chosen Emperor of the Romans, February 1742, by the name of Charles VII. and a subsidy of fifty Roman months granted him to defray the expenses of the war. Reduced to the lowest external ebb of misfortune, Maria Theresa retired into the mountainous recesses of Hungary, and assembling the States of that kingdom at Presburg, made in person an eloquent and affecting speech *, in which she declared "that she placed her sole reliance upon their courage, fidelity, and attachment: And holding up to their view the infant Prince whom she bore in her arms, conjured them to protect and defend the sacred deposit which she entrusted to their care, and to shew in this crisis of danger, by the generous ardor of their loyalty, the affection and reverence which they entertained for the blood of their antient Monarchs." Moved by this uncommon spectacle of Imperial beauty in distress, and fired by the charms of her person no less than the energy of her supplication; this rude but gallant people, drawing suddenly their sabres, replied with loud acclamations, "MORIAMUR PRO REGE NOSTRO MARIA THERESA." In consequence of the powerful aid she derived from the zeal of her Hungarian subjects, affairs soon began to wear a more favorable aspect.

Early in the spring 1742, the Austrian General Count Khevenhuller, whose military talents entitle

* In the Latin tongue, which is familiar to the Polish and Hungarian nobility.

him

him to rank with the greatest commanders, forcing the passes of Scardingen, marched into the Electorate of Bavaria, ravaged the whole country, and made himself master of Munich the capital. Prince Charles of Lorraine, who had married the Arch-dutcheſs Marianne, ſiſter to the Queen of Hungary, entered Sileſia at the head of 50,000 men, in order to oppoſe the progreſs of the Pruſſian arms. After two fierce encounters at Molwitz and Czaſlaw, in both of which the Pruſſians had the advantage, a peace was concluded through the mediation of England at Breſlau (June 1742); by which the entire province of Sileſia, the moſt fertile, rich, and populous, in the whole extent of the Auſtrian dominions, was ceded to Pruſſia. Such was the exultation of his Pruſſian Maſteſty at the concluſion of this treaty, the advantages of which ſo far exceeded his moſt ſanguine hopes and utmoſt demands at the commencement of the war, that he is ſaid to have declared himſelf willing to ſacrifice his right hand, to inſure the perpetual and faithful obſervance of it*.

* The Queen of Hungary, little aware of the extent of the combination againſt her, had not only rejected with haughtineſs the propoſals of the King of Pruſſia, but had formed a project, as was univerſally believed, with the approbation of the Court of London, for a partition of his dominions; in which the Dutchy of Magdeburgh was allotted to the King of England—the knowlege of which induced his Pruſſian Maſteſty to conclude that alliance with France, by which the very exiſtence of the Houſe of Auſtria ſeemed at one time to be endangered.

In

In September following an accommodation also took place with Saxony, at the expense of some inconsiderable districts ceded to the King of Poland. The Prince of Lorraine now advancing into Bohemia, found that the French forces, under the Marshals Broglie and Belleisle, had abandoned their conquests on being themselves abandoned by their allies, and had now retired under the cannon of Prague, which was immediately invested by the Austrians: And the siege being prolonged for many months, the French garrison was reduced to difficulties, which the most invincible resolution only could have sustained. The Austrians, supposing that they must finally surrender at discretion, refused to listen to terms of capitulation; but by an extraordinary effort of military skill and courage, the French Generals forced a passage through the Austrian army, and in the depth of winter made their retreat good to Alsace; eluding, by the secrecy and rapidity of their marches, all attempts to intercept them: The Emperor being reduced in his turn to the extremity of distress, retired to Frankfurt, where he chiefly resided during the short and wretched remainder of his life, in a state of exile and indigence. In this destitute and forlorn situation however, this Prince thought fit to issue a commissorial decree against the Queen of Hungary, couched in terms which the pride and grandeur of Aurelian in the midst of his triumphs over Zenobia scarcely scarcely had exceeded *. Referring to a former decree addressed to the Imperial Diet assembled at Francfort, and complaining of the insult and outrage offered to the whole ROMAN EMPIRE, by the Grand Dutcheſs of Tuscany, in her refusal to acknowledge his dignity and the validity of his election, he ſays, “that he had moſt graciously required of that aſſembly with moſt reſplendent moderation, how and after what manner the moſt high Imperial dignity might be ſuſtained—and declaring, from the fulneſs of Imperial power, inadmiſſible and null, and utterly cancelling and rendering void the two proteſtations of the Court of Vienna of September in the preceding, and July in the preſent year, as injurious in the higheſt degree to the majeſty and ſupreme dignity of the EMPEROR OF THE ROMANS and the grandeur of the whole ROMAN EMPIRE.”

On the ſide of Italy, the Spaniards, in order to carry their magnificent projects into effect, had aſſembled, in conjunction with the Neapolitans, an army of 60,000 men at Rimini, A. D. 1742, under the command of the Duc de Montemar, afterwards

* AURELIANUS Imperator Romanæ Orbis ZENOBIÆ.

Spontè facere debuiſtis id quod meis literis nunc jubetur. Deditionem præcipio impunitate vitæ propoſita, ita ut illic Zenobia cum tuis agas vitam ubi te ex Senatûs ampliffimi ſententia collocavero. Gemmas, argentum, aurum, ſericum, equos, camelos in ærarium Romanum conſeras. Palmyrenis juſ ſuum ſervabitur.

ſucceeded

succeeded by Count de Gages, who attempted in vain to penetrate into Tuscany. And the King of Sardinia, who dreaded with reason the aggrandizement of the House of Bourbon in Lombardy, having declared in favor of the House of Austria, and joined Count Traun the Austrian General in the Parmesan; another Spanish army, under the Infant Don Philip in person, entered Savoy*, and took possession of Chamberri; and though his Sardinian Majesty returned to the defence of his own dominions at the first notice of this attack, he could not prevent the Spaniards from taking up their winter-quarters in Savoy. In the course of this campaign, the army under Count Gages was extremely weakened by the defection of the Neapolitan troops, who were recalled by a mandate of the King of Naples, issued in consequence of the unexpected and unwelcome appearance of an English squadron in the Bay of Naples, detached by Admiral Matthews the British Commander in the Mediterranean, with the peremptory denunciation of an immediate bombardment of the city of Naples, if his Neapolitan Majesty refused to sign an explicit declaration of neutrality. The ensuing campaign in Italy did not at all advance the progress of the Spaniards. Count Gages having, contrary to his

* "Tell your master (said the Queen of Spain to the Sardinian Ambassador on his departure from Madrid) that my son shall be a King in spite of all his efforts to prevent it."

better judgment, attacked the combined army of Austrians and Piedmontese under the command of the brave and experienced Mareschal Traun at Campo-Santo*, was obliged to retreat with considerable loss, after an engagement which commenced at sun-rise, and which continued till seven at night by the light of the moon. The Mareschal being destined to yet more urgent and important services in Germany, resigned his command, September 1743, to Prince Lobkowitz. In Savoy the Infant Don Philip, reinforced by 20,000 French auxiliaries, attacked the Piedmontese lines at Chateau Dauphine—but was repulsed in repeated attacks with much damage; upon which the French retired into Dauphiné, and the Spaniards took refuge in their winter-quarters. In order to exhibit a connected view of this Italian war, which bears a very remote relation to the history of Great Britain, and to which it will not be necessary to revert, it may be proper to relate, in a few words, the principal events of the succeeding campaigns.

The King of Naples renouncing his compulsory profession of neutrality, re-assembled his army in the summer of 1744, and openly joined Count de Gages.

* This battle was rashly and unexpectedly fought, February 3, 1743; Count de Gages receiving positive orders from the Court of Madrid, to attack the enemy in three days after the arrival of the courier, or to resign his command to Count Mariani.

Prince Lobkowitz the Austrian General, marching through the Papal territories, advanced to the frontiers of Naples; and published, though with little effect, a manifesto to exhort the Neapolitans to shake off the Spanish yoke, and return to the dominion of the House of Austria. Count Brown being secretly detached by the Austrian Commander to attack the town of Velletri, where the King of Naples had established his quarters in a state of perfect apparent security, so successfully executed his commission, that his Neapolitan Majesty escaped in the darkness of the night, through a postern, with great difficulty. But Count de Gages repairing to the post in person, with great presence of mind rallied the troops, and at length compelled the Austrian General to found a retreat. The Imperial army having suffered much from the excessive heats of the summer, and the consequent epidemical diseases of an unaccustomed climate, decamped in November, in order to take up their winter-quarters in Parma. Scarcely had the Austrian Commander passed the Tiber, and lost sight of the walls of Rome, but his antagonist Count de Gages, accompanied by his Neapolitan Majesty, entered that city—but finding the bridges broken down, they desisted from the pursuit; and the Holy Father received both these contending powers with the same external demonstrations of joy and affection.

In Savoy the Infant Don Philip being joined by his allies the French, attacked the King of Sardinia, though strongly entrenched amidst the mountains of Villa-Franca; and after an obstinate engagement, this Monarch, being overpowered by numbers, was obliged to abandon his posts, and to embark on board the British squadron then cruizing off the coast, which transported him and his troops to Vado. Don Philip now prepared to penetrate through the territories of Genoa to the Milanese; but the British Commander, Admiral Matthews, declared that the King of England would consider the permission of the republic as a violation of their neutrality. The Spaniards therefore desisted towards Piedmont, and forced the strong post of Chateau-Dauphine, defended by the King of Sardinia in person, who now retreated to Saluces in order to cover his capital, while the combined army invested the strong and important fortress of Coni. Had this enterprize succeeded, the Sardinian Monarch would have been reduced to a very critical situation: But Baron Leutrum the Governor made so gallant a defence, that the Infant and the Prince of Conti, who commanded the French army, were compelled to raise the siege at the approach of winter, and to retire with great precipitation to the frontiers of France.

The campaign of 1745 proved still more disastrous and alarming: For Count de Gages, at the head head of the Spanish and Neapolitan forces, passed the Appenines, and directing his march through the territories of Genoa, which—in consequence of provocations no patience could endure—had now joined the confederacy, accomplished a junction with the army of the Infant Don Philip; and the Austrians retiring before them, the Milanese, Parma, and Placentia, submitted to the dominion of Spain. All Piedmont on both sides the Po was likewise reduced, and Turin itself menaced with a siege; yet the King of Sardinia adhered with unshaken fidelity to his engagements, and rejected with heroic firmness all proposals of a separate accommodation.

In the memorable march of Count Gages, whose passage over the Appenines was compared by the Italians to that of Hannibal over the Alps; nothing, as the historian Buonamici informs us, appeared so surprizing as the plenty which the army of that General found, when sinking under the pressure of distress, at their entrance into the territories of the republic of Lucca, though in point of natural fertility far inferior to the countries they had traversed. The roads from all the surrounding villages were crowded with carriages, conveying forage and provisions into the camp, at a season of the year when it might have been imagined that the public stores were exhausted. And it was seen and felt with irresistible conviction, tion, that the misery or happiness of the subject arises not from the nature of the soil, but of the government*.

In the ensuing year, 1746, fortune, ever capricious and inconstant, began once more to smile upon this Prince, when apparently reduced to the very verge of ruin. The Court of Vienna being no longer pressed on the side of Germany, sent powerful reinforcements into Italy, and the coffers of his Sardinian Majesty being amply replenished with British subsidies, he was enabled to take the field with redoubled force. Early in the spring Baron Leutrum, the Piedmontese General, recovered Asti, Allesandria, and Casal; Marechal Maillebois, who now commanded the French armies, retiring into the Genoese territories. On the other side, Count de Gages and Don Philip were compelled to abandon Milan, Pavia, and Parma, and retreat to Placentia, where, in the month of June, they were joined by Marechal Maillebois. In consequence of this junction, the Infant, finding himself at the head of 50,000 men, determined to attack the Austrians in their camp at San Lazaro, but met with a most severe repulse; and the Austrians pursuing their victory, in their turn attacked the enemy, August 10, near the town of Tortona, on the southern banks of the Po, the passage of which the combined armies of French and Spaniards effected not without great difficulty and loss. The Infant was, in consequence of this second defeat, compelled to abandon the city of Placentia, containing immense magazines of ammunition and military stores; and retreating towards Genoa, after a short interval quitted the territories of the republic, and took the route of Provence. Genoa was now compelled to surrender to the Austrians, who exercised the rights of conquest with such merciless rigor, that the Genoese flew to arms, and in a short time, with a courage worthy of their antient fame, totally expelled their oppressors. Whilst the Imperial Generals kept possession of Genoa, the bank of St. George was exhausted by the enormous contributions levied by the Austrians, who boasted that the wealth of this proud city was theirs, and that Genoa would in a short time be deluged in blood. And General Botta, the Austrian Commander, is said to have told the Genoese deputies, who pathetically pleaded for the mitigation of their sufferings, that he would leave them nothing except their eyes, to behold the destruction of their country, and to weep over its ruins.

* The difference between the general state and condition of the people under despotic and republican governments, however modified, forces itself upon the observation. "I know very well," says a writer of discernment, "that the republics of Genoa and Venice are not in general allowed to be free States. M. Montesquieu has demonstrated, that they are not free. But there is undoubtedly some excellence in them which has escaped this wise man, for the contrast between these and the neighboring States is very remarkable."

In April 1747, the French, under Mareschal Belleisle, once more crossed the Var, and took possession of Nice, Montalban, Villa-Franca, and Ventmiglia, almost without resistance, the Austrians and Piedmontese being employed in an attempt to recover the city of Genoa. On summoning the citizens to surrender, they replied with that spirit which almost invariably animates and pervades all classes of men living under a republican form of government, "that they would defend their liberty with the last drop of their blood, and would rather be buried in the ruins of their capital, than submit to the clemency of the Court of Vienna." Count Schuylenburg, the Austrian Commander, who conducted the operations of the siege with great skill and vigor, was at length induced reluctantly to listen to the remonstrances of the King of Sardinia, who represented to him the necessity of abandoning his enterprize in order to cover Piedmont and Lombardy from the efforts of the Mareschal de Belleisle. But the Chevalier de Belleisle, brother to the Mareschal, attempting to force the important pass of Exiles, was repulsed with prodigious slaughter; and seizing a pair of colors, with a resolution, on the renewal of the attack, to plant them with his own hand upon the ramparts, he was shot dead with a musquet ball. The troops immediately gave way in the utmost confusion, and the Mareschal, informed of this disaster, retreated back to the Var, and his Sardinian Majesty menaced Dauphiné with an invasion in his turn; but excessive rains prevented the execution of his design.

The succeeding campaign (A. D. 1748), which was the last of the war, was distinguished by no very material transaction; the near prospect of peace rendering it equally unadvisable on both sides to risque any hazardous enterprize. And the Infant Don Philip was by one of the articles of the Treaty put into possession of Parma, Placentia, and Guastalla—the King of Sardinia receiving, in conformity to a previous agreement with the Queen of Hungary, and as a just remuneration for the fidelity and attachment he had discovered to the interests, and the courage he had displayed in the defence, of the House of Austria, some contiguous districts of Novara and the Milanese. As soon as certain intelligence had arrived, that the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle was signed, the British Admiral acquainted the Senate of Genoa of that event, in a message delivered by one of his captains, who had at the same time express orders to assure the republic how great was the admiration he entertained of the fortitude and valor displayed by them in the defence of their liberties. “Such, says the Italian historian, is the magnanimity of the British nation*.”

It is now high time to advert to the situation of Great Britain, and to trace the mazes of that policy by which she became a principal in this destructive war, which, had she consulted her proper interests, would scarcely have involved her as an auxiliary. The opposition exulted much in the royal declaration of war against Spain, which they affirmed to be an echo of their reasonings and arguments against the Convention; although the truths it contained were at that time positively denied by the Minister and his adherents—and since that time not one event had happened which was not by his opponents previously foretold.

* Buonamici's Commentaries, Book IV.

The session which commenced November 1739, closed April 29, 1740, without producing any remarkable event. The Pension Bill was, according to almost annual custom, passed by the Commons and rejected by the Lords. But the Place Bill, which was again introduced with many judicious modifications and numerous exceptions, was thrown out by a very small majority of the Commons in a very full House, the numbers being 222 to 206. As it was clearly perceived that the Court was forced into the present contest against Spain, the great popularity of the war did not at all diminish, or rather it tended to heighten, the unpopularity of the Minister. After the capture of Porto-Bello, and the ill-conducted attempt on Cartagena, the spirit of enterprize seemed no more—the fleets of Spain sailed unmolested from their harbors, though British squadrons were stationed off the Spanish coasts, for the professed purpose of intercepting them. Commerce was interrupted by the numbers of seamen pressed into the service of government—and still more by the incredible number of prizes taken by the Spanish privateers. The discontents of the merchants were unnecessarily inflamed by the rash and passionate answer of Sir Charles Wager, who, when a memorial was presented to him as first Lord of the Admiralty, for protection and redress,—replied, “it is your own war, and you must take it for your pains.” The harbor and fortifications of Dunkirk were repaired by order of the French King, in open violation of the treaty of Utrecht. A French fleet had sailed in company with the Spaniards to the West Indies, for the avowed purpose of protecting the Spanish commerce, and serious apprehensions were entertained for the safety of Jamaica.

When the Parliament was convened in November 1740, the nation, throughout all the different ranks and descriptions of citizens, exhibited evident and alarming symptoms of discontent. Eager to embrace the favorable moment, Mr. Sandys, one of the leaders of opposition, soon after the commencement of the session, notified to Sir Robert Walpole in the House of Commons, his intention on the Friday following to bring forward a charge against him. At this unexpected intimation, the Minister seemed at first somewhat disconcerted and surprized: But recovering himself, after a short pause, replied “that as he was conscious of no crime, crime, he had no doubt of being able to make a proper defence—and laying his hand with emotion on his breast, he added, with Roman dignity,

—————“Hic murus aheneus esto, Nil confidere tibi, nulla pallefcere culpa.”

On the day appointed, Mr. Sandys accordingly, at the clofe of a long fpeech, in which he recapitulated all the political delinquencies, real or pretended, of the Minifter, moved, “that an humble addrefs fhould be prefented to the King, befeeching his Majefty that he would be graciously pleafed to remove the Right Honourable Sir Robert Walpole, firft Commiffioner of the treafury, &c., from his Majefty’s prefence and counfels for ever.” The motion was ably fufained by the members in oppofition, particularly by Mr. Pulteney, who took a very fevere retrospective view of the conduct of the Minifter, from the commencement of his adminiftration. “By the treaty of Seville, faid this eloquent fpeaker, we were very nearly driven to the perilous extremity of entering into a war with the Emperor, as the direct confequence of our conjunction with France and Spain. But the nation took the alarm, and the Minifter was obliged to confult his fafety; and this impelled him to avert the danger by a precipitate unconditional guarantee of the Pragmatic Sanction. But though,

• “Be this my brazen bulwark of defence,
Still to preferve a confcious innocence.” FRANCIS.

in consequence of this rash measure, and this alone, the Emperor consented to the introduction of Spanish troops into the Dutchies of Parma and Placentia, Spain performed nothing on her part of what she had engaged. On the contrary, the depredations of that nation on our West India commerce daily increased; and thus affairs stood when France, in alliance with Spain and Sardinia, thought fit to attack the Emperor in 1733, with an avowed design to strip him of all his dominions in Italy. Of this attack we remained idle, though not unexpensive, spectators, till we saw on the one hand Naples, and even Sicily, procured for him by England, at the price of a war with Spain, wrested from the Emperor; and on the other, the Dutchy of Lorraine added to the Monarchy of France. On the first accession of the Minister to the sole direction of public affairs, there was a fair prospect, Mr. Pulteney said, of discharging, within a reasonable time, every shilling of the public debt—but this would have diminished the Minister's fund for corruption, and it was therefore by all means to be prevented; and the public charge was to be yearly increased, in order to oblige us to the alternative of applying the produce of the Sinking Fund to the current service, or of contracting a new debt, equal to that which was paid off. The expenses of the civil government were also so prodigiously enhanced, that a demand of £500,000 was made in the year 1725, to pay the debts of the Civil List, though the like sum had been granted for the same purpose but four years before. Upon his present Majesty's accession, an addition of £100,000 was made to the Civil List, besides £115,000 for making good a pretended deficiency in that revenue. But what furnished the most successful pretext for increasing the public burdens, was the famous TREATY of HANOVER, professedly concluded for preventing the dangers with which Europe was threatened, from the over-grown power of the House of Austria. Had the danger alleged been real, this nation ought to have been the last, because it had certainly the least, to fear. But the fact was, that the Dutch, who lay most exposed, were so little apprehensive of danger, that it was not without much sollicitation, and after considerable delay, that they could be persuaded to accede to this treaty. And France, to whom the alliance of Spain and the Emperor might reasonably be supposed to appear formidable, neither chose to incur any expense, nor discovered any sollicitude to assist us when actually attacked by Spain in consequence of this treaty; whereas WE took 12,000 Hessians into our pay; granted subsidies to the Kings of Sweden and Denmark, and, what was most extraordinary, to the Duke of Wolfenbuttle, six months after the preliminaries of peace with Spain and the Emperor were signed: And the Hef-
in

Hessians were continued in pay for several years. When a scheme was afterwards offered by a patriotic Member of this House—Sir John Barnard—for reducing the interest payable upon all our public funds; it is unnecessary to say by whom, and what means, that scheme was defeated—and considering how practicable a plan it was at that time, we must conclude that the Minister who opposed it could have no design that our debts should be ever paid, or our taxes diminished.”

On this trying occasion, Sir Robert Walpole nevertheless defended himself with such vigor and ability, that the motion of Mr. Sandys was finally rejected by a very great majority. “The successive measures of his administration, the Minister alleged, were adapted to the different exigencies of the times—they had received the repeated and unequivocal sanction of successive Parliaments—the sole object of that system of policy by which his public conduct had been regulated, was to preserve the tranquillity of Europe, which was to be effected only by maintaining the balance of Europe.—The charge of corruption, so generally brought, the Minister as generally denied—and, to the amazement and confusion of his friends, he positively challenged his accuser to produce one specific instance of this nature in confirmation of his accusation. In the course of his speech he animadverted with great spirit upon the indiscriminate use of the term patriotism. A Patriot, Sir! said he, addressing the chair—I venerate the name. But then, it is the real, and not the pretended Patriot, who is the object of my reverence. In these times, Sir, Patriots spring up like mushrooms—I could raise twenty of them in a night—A Minister has nothing more to do, than to refuse compliance with an unjust or unreasonable demand, and up starts a Patriot. But, Sir, the unprincipled efforts of such Patriots I alike disdain and detest.” After a short interval, a motion to the same purport with that of Mr. Sandys, was made in the House of Peers by Lord Carteret, and supported by the Duke of Argyle, and the Lords Gower, Bathurst, and Chesterfield. It was negatived, but thirty Peers entered their protest; and the credit and authority of the Minister were sensibly impaired by these repeated attacks.
indis-

In April 1741, the King delivered in person, a speech to both Houses of Parliament, informing them that the Queen of Hungary had made a requisition of assistance from England, agreeably to the tenor of the subsisting treaties—that he had ordered the Danish and Hessian auxiliaries to be in readiness to march for that purpose—that in this complicated and uncertain state of affairs, it might become necessary for him to incur extraordinary expenses for maintaining inviolate the Pragmatic Sanction, for which he trusted they would provide.

The

The Commons assured the King in their address, "that they entirely approved of the measures already pursued, and that they would enable him effectually to support his engagements with the Queen of Hungary." Two hundred thousand pounds were accordingly voted upon the motion of the Minister, as a parliamentary grant or gratuity to that Princess, and £300,000 more to his Majesty, to be employed at his discretion, in the manner most conducive to her service; seventy thousand men had been before voted for the army and navy, and the accustomed subsidies granted to Denmark and Hesse Cassel. "HONEST SHIPPEN*" only ventured to oppose this wild and wanton waste of the public money. "He protested, on this as on all other occasions, against any interposition in the affairs of Germany. He protested against that clause of the address, by which the House engaged to defend his Majesty's foreign dominions from insult, or attack, as utterly inconsistent with the Act of Settlement—declaring, that if the repeated and shameful evasions of that Act, or rather the open violations of it, could have been foreseen, they would probably have for ever precluded from the succession that illustrious family, to which the nation owed such NUMBERLESS BLESSINGS, SUCH CON-

* "I love to pour out all myself, as plain

As HONEST SHIPPEN, or downright Montagne,"

POPE.

TINUED

TINUED FELICITY." On the 25th of April 1741, the session closed, and the King took his leave of this Parliament in the prospect of its dissolution, with many expressions of gratitude and satisfaction.

The NEW PARLIAMENT being convened December 1, 1741, the King in his speech expressed his hope and expectation, that the two Houses would confirm the resolutions formed by their predecessors for the support of the Pragmatic Sanction, the preservation of the balance of power, the liberties of Europe, and the security of his dominions. An address of thanks and approbation being moved as usual, a clause was proposed to intreat his Majesty not to engage these kingdoms in a war for the preservation of his foreign dominions. In vindication of which, Mr. Shippen arose and declared, "that he was neither afraid nor ashamed to affirm that thirty years had made no change in any of his political opinions. He said that he was grown old in the House of Commons, and had lived to see his conjectures and predictions ripened into knowlege. I may, said he, perhaps fall under the censure of the House, and be once more treated as a criminal, for asserting what they who punish me cannot deny—that Hanoverian maxims are inconsistent with the interest and happiness of this nation—that the wise policy of the Act of Settlement ought to be adhered to; and that England ought ought not to be endangered, in order that the King's foreign dominions may be secured."—"Are we, exclaimed with energy another Member *, in reference to the same question, to stand up single in the defence of the Pragmatic Sanction? to fight for ever the quarrels of others? and live in perpetual war, that our neighbors may enjoy the advantages of peace?" The address, as it was originally moved, was however presented to the King, the opposition not deeming it a fit opportunity to make trial of their strength. But a petition from the Electors of Westminster coming after a short interval under the cognizance of the House, the election of the fitting Members, who were the Court candidates, was declared void by a majority of four voices; and the High Bailiff was committed to custody. Other controverted elections being likewise decided to the disadvantage of the Court, and against its utmost exertions; Sir Robert Walpole became sensible that his political career hastened to its termination. Anxious however to make one effort more to retain that authority which he had so long exercised almost without control, and which he could not now relinquish without danger; he caused a royal message to be sent to the Prince of Wales, importing that if his Royal Highness would accede to terms with his Majesty, his revenue should be immediately raised to £100,000 per annum;—£200,000 should be advanced for the payment of his debts; he and his friends should be taken into favor, and a suitable provision made for all his followers. But the Prince positively declared, “that he would accept of no such conditions, or of any conditions, while public affairs continued under the direction of Sir Robert Walpole—whom he regarded as the bar which separated his Majesty from the affections of his people—as the grand author of the national losses, disgraces, and grievances, at home and abroad.” Repulsed in this attempt, the Minister, now in imminent danger of an impeachment, endeavored in vain to detach from their political connection some of the leaders of the opposite party: And finding himself on the next division again left in a minority, he declared he would never more enter the walls of that House. On the ensuing day, February 3, 1742, the King adjourned both Houses of Parliament to the 18th, and immediately upon this adjournment, Sir Robert Walpole was created Earl of Orford, and resigned all his employments. Various intrigues and negotiations were carried on during this recess; and it soon appeared that a fatal division had taken place among the Patriots, and that divers of them who had made the loudest professions of honor and virtue, who had repeatedly menaced the Minister with clamors of inquiry and denun-denunciations of vengeance, and who had boasted that no art could dissolve the cement by which they were united, had secretly acceded to an insidious and disgraceful accommodation with the Court, of which the impunity of the late Minister was understood to be a fundamental article. The Duke of Newcastle, and Mr. Pelham, with their adherents, were allowed to retain their places. The Earl of Wilmington succeeded Sir Robert Walpole, as first Lord Commissioner of the Treasury; Mr. Sandys was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer. Lord Carteret took the Seals, as Secretary of State for the foreign department, and was regarded as chief Minister; and Mr. Pulteney, who refused to accept any office of responsibility, was sworn anew of the Privy Counsel, and was soon afterwards created Earl of Bath—but though he had flattered himself with the idea of guiding unseen the reins of government, he was never admitted to the least share of royal confidence, and remained the victim of his own treachery—"a solitary monument of blasted ambition." The nation saw with astonishment and indignation, in this coalition of parties, a change, not of measures but of men; they saw the old system not only adopted, but confirmed and strengthened; they saw the same influence in Parliament exerted for the same purposes, and in the transports of their resentment, the new Ministers were branded as apostates and

* Mr. Viner.

and betrayers of their country; and patriotism was ridiculed and exploded as an illusive and empty name *. Soon after the new Ministry had entered

* The Duke of Argyle, who had, on the dismissal of Sir Robert Walpole, accepted the command of the royal regiment of horse and master-generalship of the ordnance, on being apprized of the political collusion which had been practised, in a very short time, in the utmost resentment, threw up his places.

At or about this period an ODE was addressed by the celebrated ARKENSIDE, the votary of Apollo in his twofold capacity—per me concordant carmina, medicina meum est—to Mr. Pulteney, under the name of CURIO, containing very bitter and poignant reflections on his political apostacy. The following stanzas Indignation has exalted into poetry :

“ At length in view the glorious end appear’d,
We saw thy spirit through the senate reign;
And Freedom’s friends thy instant omen heard
Of laws, for which their fathers bled in vain :—
O Alfred, father of the English name,
O valiant Edward, first in civil fame,
O William, height of public virtue pure,
Bend from your radiant seats a joyful eye,
Behold the sum of all your labours nigh,
Your plans of law complete, your ends of rule secure.

“ ’Twas then, O shame ! O soul from faith estrang’d, O Albion, oft to flatt’ring vows a prey;
’Twas then—thy thought what sudden frenzy chang’d?
What rushing palsy took thy strength away?
Is this the man in Freedom’s cause approv’d?
The man so great, so honour’d, so belov’d?
Whom the dead envied and the living blest’d?
This patient slave by tinsel bonds allur’d?
This wretched suitor for a boon abjur’d?
Whom those that fear’d him scorn, that trusted him detest?”

upon their unctious, the PENSION BILL, which had been formerly the darling object of the Patriots, was revived and passed by the Commons, but once more received sentence of condemnation from the Lords, LORD CARTERET HIMSELF GIVING HIS VOTE AGAINST IT. A motion made for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the Septennial Act was vehemently opposed by Mr. PULTENEY and Mr. SANDYS, and the question passed in the negative. The Place Bill, now brought forward by Mr. Lyttelton, met with the same fate. The motion for an inquiry into the conduct of Robert Earl of Orford, during the twenty years of his administration, was also rejected; but the motion being renewed, and limited to the last ten years, it was with great difficulty carried against the Court: But a subsidiary Bill, for indemnifying those who should be summoned to give evidence against that Nobleman, was rejected, after it had passed the Commons, through the opposition of Lord Carteret: So that the inquiry proved, as it was no doubt intended to prove, finally abortive. Two reports, however, were actually presented by the Committee of Inquiry to the House, by which, amongst other interesting particulars, it appears on record, that, exclusive of all the open and avowed means of influence, the enormous sum of one million four hundred and fifty-three thousand pounds had been expended during the last ten years for SECRET SERVICE. Paxton, Solicitor to the Treasury, refusing to answer interrogatories put to him by the Committee, was committed to close custody, but still persisted in his contumacy; and Scroope, Secretary to the Treasury, through whose hands vast sums had passed, declared, that he could not IN CONSCIENCE, after consulting the ablest lawyers and divines, and laying his case before his Majesty, to whom alone he thought himself responsible, discover in what manner this money had been expended, or to what purposes appropriated. And the Committee state in their reports, as a subject of most serious complaint, that the very magnitude and extent of the evil are become the means of screening it from detection and punishment. Amongst those whose eloquence enforced a reluctant adoption of the motion of inquiry, no one more distinguished himself than Mr. Pitt, a young man of extraordinary talents, who had risen during the few years he had sat in the House of Commons into very high reputation. In reply to the pretext of danger to the State from this investigation, he declared, "that he was so far from apprehending danger from this inquiry, that he firmly believed the nation could only be injured by a long neglect of such examinations. Is it, said he, unbecoming the wisdom and dignity of this assembly, to inquire to what causes and to what misconduct it is to be imputed, that we are neither able to acquire the laurels of war, nor to enjoy the blessings of peace? that, during the long continuance of the national tranquillity, our debts have not been diminished from that state to which they were raised by fighting at our own expense the general quarrel of mankind? why the sinking fund, that inviolable deposit, has been annually diverted from its appropriated purposes? I fear not to declare, that I expect, in consequence of such inquiry, to find, that our treasure has been exhausted, not to humble our enemies, or to obviate domestic insurrections—not to support our allies, or to suppress our factions—but for purposes which no man who loves his country can think of without indignation—the purchase of votes, the bribing of boroughs, the enriching of hirelings, the multiplying of dependents, the corruption of senates. If those to whom the administration of affairs has been for twenty years confided, have betrayed their trust—if they have invaded the public rights with the public treasure, and employed the power committed to them by their country only to enslave it, who will not acknowledge that a sacrifice to justice is called for—that they ought to be set as land-marks to posterity, to warn those who shall hereafter launch on the ocean of power, not to be too confident of an ever-prosperous gale, but to remember that there are rocks on which whoever rushes must inevitably perish * ?”
to

In

* A bill appointing Commissioners, seven in number, for taking, examining, and stating, the public accounts of the kingdom,

In forming a just estimate of the political character of Sir Robert Walpole, who, for more than twenty years, governed these kingdoms with distinguished reputation and ability, we shall find ample ground both for applause and censure. Regarding him in the most favourable point of view, we are compelled to acknowledge that, under the auspices of this Minister, justice was equitably and impartially administered; the prerogative of the Monarch was invariably restrained within the strict limits of the law; commerce was, by many wise laws, encouraged and extended; the riches of the nation rapidly increased; and the rights and liberties of the people were maintained inviolate. But, if we contemplate the interior policy of his administration, we perceive it, however fair in appearance, rotten at the core, tainted and sicklied o'er with the cadaverous hue of corruption; and threatening, in its progress, to undermine all public virtue, and to extinguish every spark of public spirit. Compelled, in order to secure the favour of his Sovereign, and with the vain hope to perpetuate himself in office, to adopt measures contrary to his better judgment, and the true interests of his country, he saw that the most, or rather the only, certain dom, passed with little opposition; but, on the ballot, the courtiers exerted themselves so successfully, that the numbers were decidedly in favour of the court list; upon which the patriots, in sullen resentment, suffered the bill, after being reported, to be finally thrown out.

method of carrying those obnoxious measures into effect, was to create an interest in Parliament separate from that of the people: By the basest and most degrading arts of political depravity, a majority of votes in both Houses was obtained and secured; and since the establishment of this system of ministerial corruption, which has descended to us in its full force, the deliberations of Parliament are become little better than the conflicts of faction, or the empty forms of freedom *. Parliament, which ought

* Foreign, as it may justly be deemed, from the purpose of history, which descends not to the contemplation of the private characters of men, any further than they may be interwoven with their public life, it may be transiently remarked that this Minister, although he cannot be applauded for the purity of his morals, possessed, in an eminent degree, all those happy social qualities which conciliate affection, if they fail to engage esteem. This striking trait of Sir Robert Walpole's general character has been touched in a masterly manner by the poetic pencil of POPE:

“ Seen him I have, but in his happier hour
Of social pleasure, ill exchange'd for power;
Seen him uncumber'd with the venal tribe,
Smile without art, and win without a bribe.”

Sir Robert Walpole, in person, was tall, somewhat bulky, and his countenance is described as noble and benign. Of his attachment to the fine arts, the magnificent collection of pictures at Houghton was a very decisive proof: But his neglect or contempt of literature, though not himself wholly devoid of learning, exposed him to continual disgrace; for, while the measures of his administration were attacked by men of the highest talents, they were vindicated only by scribblers, who were ought to exhibit an unclouded display of wisdom, integrity, and benevolence, combined in one illustrious assemblage, is virtually degraded to a court convened only for the purpose of enregistering the royal edicts. It is not the grave and well-weighed counsels of the legislature which, under this system, direct the movements of the executive power; but it is the caprice, the pride, and the folly of the executive power which have too frequently influenced and governed the volitions of the legislative body. It is an acknowledged truth, a truth upon parliamentary record—that “THE INFLUENCE OF THE CROWN OUGHT TO BE DIMINISHED;” but no vigorous steps have yet been taken to effect that diminution. A reform of the representation, a reduction of the standing military force, a progressive redemption of the public debt, and a total abolition of all useless and superfluous places, pensions, and sinecures, upon which the monster CORRUPTION feeds and thrives, are alone adequate to accomplish the mighty task of a national regeneration.

were liberally paid for writing, what even the most partial friends of the Minister could scarcely endure to read. A pension of three thousand livres, granted by Louis XV. to the celebrated M. Crebillon, gave rise in England to the following jeu d'esprit:

“ At reading this, great WALPOLE shook his head;
How! wit and genius help a man to bread!
With better skill we pension and promote;
None eat with us who cannot give a vote.”

E 4

And

And if that energy and virtue are wanting in the community at large, which will in time incite to the adoption of such means as are necessary to effectuate this end, what remains but to await, in deep and tranquil silence, the moment in which the national liberty is fated finally to terminate in that absolute monarchy which, according to a profound and celebrated writer, forms the true euthanasia of the BRITISH CONSTITUTION?

The new administration was now completely formed, and the whole formidable series of patriotic motions had been successfully consigned, by their former advocates, to repose and oblivion. Affairs, therefore, now reverting to their regular and accustomed channels, the House of Commons was moved, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to resolve itself into a Committee of Supply; and, conformably to the estimates and resolutions brought forward, upwards of an hundred thousand seamen and landmen were voted for the service of the current year; the sum of five hundred thousand pounds was granted to the Queen of Hungary, and the subsidies to Denmark and Hesse Cassel continued*. But this was deemed by the Court a very ina-

* “ Such, says the Gothic annalist of the times, were the exertions of the new ministers to make some figure with the people in support of the measures of his Majesty, that no less than five millions seven hundred and twenty-three thousand pounds had been inadequate aid; and it soon appeared that the new Minister, Lord Carteret, a man haughty and confident, had formed vast and dangerous projects, calculated for the sole purpose of recommending himself to the favour of the King, who was ambitious to signalize his talents, as King WILLIAM had formerly done, at the head of a grand Continental army. With this view, therefore, sixteen thousand regular troops, afterwards increased to a much larger number, and which might have been employed to great advantage in different naval expe-

been granted this session in the committee of supply: All of it, he adds exultingly, except 20,000l. voted for building Westminster bridge, for the purposes of the war, or for supplying the deficiencies of the expense of last year's warlike preparations."

Is it not worth while, however, to pause a moment, and ask whether the community has not, according to the calm verdict of reason, derived more real and permanent advantage from the expenditure of the 20,000l. in a work of public utility and magnificence, than of the millions so eagerly and lavishly appropriated to the purposes of devastation and destruction? Is it pity or scorn, amazement or sorrow, indignation or derision, that such national infatuation as this is calculated in a philosophic mind most strongly to excite? Or is power delegated by communities to individuals only to multiply and perpetuate their own miseries? How forcibly does history confirm the humiliating reflection of the poet:

"——— Man, proud man,
Drest in a little brief authority,
Plays such fantastic tricks before high Heaven
As makes the angels weep."

ditions,

ditions, were, in the month of April 1742, embarked for Flanders, and were shortly after joined by sixteen thousand Hanoverians and six thousand Hessians, in British pay, and a numerous body of Austrians. The Earl of Stair, created, on the recent resignation of the Duke of Argyle, Field-Marshal of Great Britain, a Nobleman distinguished as well for his personal accomplishments as his military and political talents, was appointed Generalissimo of this new army. Being invested with the character of Ambassador Extraordinary to the States General, he exerted in vain the whole force of his eloquence to prevail upon their High Mightinesses to concur in the projects of the King of Great Britain. Although the States had come to a previous resolution considerably to augment their forces, they declared their determination to adhere to their neutrality. And the English General finding himself unable, without their assistance, to engage in those offensive operations he had in contemplation, which were said to be the siege of Dunkirk, to be followed, if successful, by a rapid march to the Somme, distributed his army into cantonments in the countries of Flanders, Liege, and Luxemburg.

Lord Stair's negotiation proving ineffectual, Lord Carteret was himself delegated with new propositions for the consideration and choice of their High Mightinesses: 1. That the republic should declare war against France in concert with England, &c. 2. That they should garrison the fortified towns in Flanders belonging to the Queen of Hungary, to enable her to employ her troops in the field: 3. That Great Britain should take thirty thousand of the troops of Holland into British pay: Lastly, To enter into a new treaty of commerce very advantageous to the republic. The States General, in reply, declared their reluctance, by entering into the war, to make it more bloody; they, with a noble pride, asserted, that the troops of the republic were raised only for the defence of the republic, and THEY HAD NEVER HIRED THEM OUT. As to the last proposition, it was acknowledged to be very acceptable, but too dearly purchased at the expense of a war. These answers, however consonant to the moderation, wisdom, and dignity of the republic, gave little satisfaction to the English Minister, who returned to London much displeased and disappointed at his failure.

When the Parliament of Great Britain met in November 1742, the conduct of the new Ministry was arraigned in the bitterest terms of severity. The Earl of Chesterfield, who had not been included in the new arrangements of office, asserted, that the assembling an army in Flanders without the concurrence of the States General, or any other power engaged by treaty, or bound by interest, to support the Queen of Hungary, was a rash and ridiculous measure; that it would inevitably involve the nation as principals in an expensive and ruinous war; and that the arms and wealth of Great Britain alone were not adequate to the purpose of raising the House of Austria to its former height of elevation; that, while England exhausted her resources to carry into effect her romantic and impracticable projects, the Electorate of Hanover, though under the same engagements, and governed by the same Prince, contributed nothing as an ally to her assistance, but was paid by Great Britain for all the forces it had sent into the field, and at a very exorbitant price. After having exalted the Elector of Hanover from a state of obscurity to the Crown, this nation, said his Lordship, is condemned to hire the troops of that Electorate to fight in their own cause, to hire them at a rate which was never demanded before, and to pay levy-money for them, though it is known to all Europe that they were not raised for this occasion." The Duke of Bedford also, a Nobleman of many private and public virtues, and of a family illustriously distinguished by the ardour of its attachment to the true interests of their country, affirmed, on this occasion, "that the measures of the English Ministry had long been regulated by the interest of his Majesty's Electoral territories; that these had long been considered as a gulf, into which the treasures of Great Britain had been thrown; that the state of Hanover had been changed, without any visible cause, cause, since the accession of its Princes to the throne of England. The marks of affluence and prosperity were of late discernible in all its districts, without any discovery of mines or extension of commerce; and new dominions had been purchased, the price of which it was more than suspected was never paid from the revenues of Hanover." The motion, however, for an address to the throne, "beseeching and advising his Majesty to exonerate his subjects of the charge and burden of those mercenaries who were taken into the service last year without the knowledge or consent of Parliament," was rejected; Lord Carteret, the new Minister, with heroic effrontery, setting every appearance of consistency at defiance, and engaging with the most zealous ardour in the prosecution and defence of measures which he had himself repeatedly held up to the public scorn, indignation, and derision. In the course of the session, the Place Bill was again brought forward, and again rejected by the Commons, the numbers, on the division, being 221 against 196. Mr. Sandys declared himself indeed to be as great, if not a greater, friend than ever to the bill, but that the TIME was improper; that it was necessary previously to remove certain prejudices which had been scattered round the throne; and that he was against urging the measure at present, because he hoped the period would shortly arrive when it would be readily agreed to by every branch of the legislature. A motion for reviving the inquiry into the conduct of Sir Robert Walpole for the last ten years, was negatived by 253 against 186. In pursuance of the plan of Continental warfare now adopted by the Court of London, the Earl of Stair assembled the confederate forces early in the spring (A. D. 1743), with a view, as was believed, of penetrating the frontier of France on the side of the Moselle; but being opposed by the Austrian and Hanoverian Generals intrusted with the secret resolves of the English Court, the whole army directed its course towards the Maine. On their near approach to Francfort, the Emperor, alarmed with the apprehension of falling as a captive into the hands of the King of England, prepared to fly for refuge, though he seemed scarcely to know whither; but the English commander deputed, without delay, an officer of distinction with a message to his Imperial Majesty, assuring him, in the name of the King his master, that the respect due to the Imperial dignity should not be violated, nor the city he had chosen for his personal residence molested. The Emperor, notwithstanding, retired first to Munich, and, on the re-approach of the Austrians, to Augsburg, whence he returned, at the termination of the campaign, to his former residence at Francfort. The Court of Versailles, which had in vain made advances of accommodation to the Court of Vienna, now apprehending the
the

of

the junction of the allies commanded by Lord Stair with the Austrians under Prince Charles of Lorraine, directed the Mareschal de Noailles to assemble an army of 60,000 men on the Maine, while the Mareschal de Coigné was placed at the head of a yet superior army in Alsace, to oppose any attempt of the Austrian commander to penetrate into France by forcing the passage of the Rhine. The King of England, eager to gather those laurels which imagination had already woven into wreaths and garlands, accompanied by his younger son the Duke of Cumberland—now, for the first time, appearing in the field—arrived in June at the camp of Aschaffenburg. Here, however, to his unspeakable surprise and chagrin, the Monarch soon found himself and his whole army reduced to a very critical situation, by the superior skill and conduct of the Mareschal de Noailles, whose plan of military operation during this campaign, the King of Prussia tells us, would have done honour to the most renowned captain. This General had, early in the summer, taken possession of the cities of Spire, Worms, and Oppenheim, and, passing the Rhine, had encamped on the east side of the river, above Francfort, in a position which commanded the navigation of the upper Maine; at the same time occupying all the adjacent posts on the Rhine and Maine, so as effectually to bar all access with the surrounding country, and to intercept cept all convoys of provision or supply. The King of England, therefore, found himself under the necessity of decamping from Aschaffenburg, and directed his march to Hanau, where he expected to meet large reinforcements. But the Marechal, foreseeing that the Allies would not long be able to maintain their position, had taken his measures accordingly; and, on approaching the village of Dettingen, his Britannic Majesty found the French army drawn up in battle-array, with a view to oppose his farther progress. To so perilous an extremity no King of England, in encountering a foreign enemy, had ever been reduced. In front were the narrow and dangerous defiles of Dettingen, occupied in force by the enemy; on the left flowed the river Maine, on the high opposite banks of which the French had planted a formidable line of batteries; on the right were mountains and woods, intersected by a morass; and all retreat was precluded by the vigilance of the French commander, who had taken possession of Aschaffenburg immediately on its being evacuated by the British forces. No event more favourable could be expected than that the whole army must, in a short time, surrender themselves prisoners of war; and the Marechal de Noailles might reasonably presume, that for him was reserved the glory of avenging the fatal catastrophe of Poitiers. But the rash and inexperienced valour of the Duc de Grammont blasted these brilliant liant hopes; advancing through the defiles, contrary to the express orders of the Marechal, who was compelled to move with the whole army in order to sustain this unseasonable attack, he offered the enemy battle upon equal terms in the inclosed plain. The French charged with their usual impetuosity, but were received by the English with cool and determined intrepidity. The King himself displayed much personal courage, and the French were repulsed with great slaughter, and compelled to repass the Maine with the loss of 6000 men; though they suffered no molestation in their retreat, the King of England pursuing without delay his march to Hanau, impatient to receive his expected supplies and reinforcements. The Duke of Cumberland, who fought with great gallantry, was wounded in the action. At Hanau the King was visited by Prince Charles of Lorraine and Count Khevenhuller; but no operations of consequence took place during the remainder of this campaign, the original or specific object of which it might baffle the profoundest sagacity to devise. Towards the latter end of the summer, the allied army passed the Rhine at Mentz, and the King of England fixed his head-quarters at Worms. Here the advances of the Diet, who, solicitous to restore the peace of the Empire, wrote letters to the King of England and the States General, requesting, in concert with themselves, the mediation of the maritime powers, being previously rejected, a treaty was signed with the Queen of Hungary and the King of Sardinia, who engaged to maintain 40,000 infantry and a proportionable corps of cavalry, for the service of the Queen of Hungary in Italy. The allurements held out to his Sardinian Majesty were, an English subsidy of £280,000 per annum, the transfer of certain districts of the Milanese, and the prospect of gaining the Marquisate of Finale, her pretensions to which, by an article of this treaty, her Hungarian Majesty most generously assigned over to this Monarch; although an actual and unconditional cession of that territory to the republic of Genoa, to which it had anciently belonged, though wrested from her by the violence of the House of Austria, had been made by the late Emperor Charles VI. for the sum of 400,000 golden crowns, for which it had been previously mortgaged; and which sum, it is true, her Hungarian Majesty now condescended to grant her royal permission to the republic to receive from any power willing and able to repay it*. The republic remonstrated in the

* The tenth article of the treaty of Worms, relating to the cession of Finale, is a great historical curiosity, and exhibits the crooked and insidious policy of Lord Carteret in a very striking point of view. It is as follows: "As it is of importance to the public cause, that his Majesty the King of Sardinia should have an immediate communication of his dominions with the sea and with the maritime powers, her Majesty the Queen of Hungary

the strongest manner against a treaty so injurious to her rights ; protesting also, in a memorial presented

Hungary and Bohemia yields to him all the rights which she may have in any manner, and upon any title whatsoever, to the town and marquisate of Finale, which rights she yields and transfers, without any restrictions, to the King, in the same manner as she does the countries described in the foregoing article ; in the just expectation that the republic of Genoa will facilitate, as far as shall be necessary, a disposition so indispensably requisite for the liberty and security of Italy, in consideration of the sum which shall be found due to the republic, without his Majesty the King of Sardinia, or her Majesty the Queen of Hungary, being obliged to contribute to the payment of the said sum : Provided always, that the town of Finale be and remain for ever a free-port town, as is Leghorn ; and that it shall be allowable for his Majesty the King of Sardinia to re-establish there the forts which have been demolished, or to cause others to be built, according as he shall judge convenient." It is evident that Lord Carteret, conscious of the nefariousness of this attempt, dared not openly to sacrifice the faith and honor of the English nation, which had actually guaranteed, by the fourth article of the Quadruple Alliance, the possession of Finale to the Genoese, by making it a direct party in the transaction. It was no doubt the purpose of the English Minister to persuade the Parliament of Great Britain to pay the money in question, and to compel the Senate of Genoa to take it. But, if he found the opposition to this measure too strong, he had this evasion in reserve, that the rights of the Queen of Hungary, if invalid in themselves, gave no additional sanction to the claims of the King of Sardinia ; that the republic was not obliged to consent to the redemption of the mortgage, nor was Great Britain under any obligation to offer it. Thus a flagitious scheme was formed, which might be easily abandoned if found impracticable in the execution. A negotiation at the sented to the Imperial Diet, against this transaction, and claiming the protection of that august body; Finale being an ancient and acknowledged fief of the Empire. But Lord Carteret, who had accompanied the King of England to Germany, and negotiated this affair in person, treated the embassy of the republic with the most marked and insufferable contempt, though the Queen of Hungary herself hesitated to insist upon the validity of her claim. In consequence of this abominable injustice, the Senate of Genoa concluded a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, with Spain, at close of the summer was carried on with the Emperor, and articles of accommodation actually agreed upon, with the reluctant concurrence of the Queen of Hungary, by which the hereditary dominions of the Emperor were to be restored, on condition of a renunciation of his claims on the Austrian succession. By a separate article of the treaty, the sum of six millions of florins was, by a temporary assignment on certain lands, allotted to the Emperor for the support of the Imperial dignity, all deficiencies in the payment of which were to be made good by the King of England. Lord Carteret, however, resolving not to take upon himself the sole responsibility of this article, delayed the signing of the treaty till a messenger was dispatched to the regency in London, requiring their assent to it. But, to the surprise and chagrin both of the King and the Emperor, the regency sent word, "that they were of opinion, it was better, till the accomplishment of a general peace, to leave the burden of supporting his Imperial Majesty on the Court of France, who would soon be tired of the expense." The negotiation, therefore, proved ultimately abortive.

Aranjuez, the following year—provoking, by this means, the implacable resentment of the House of Austria, which appeared to deem the absolute annihilation of the republic scarcely an adequate atonement for such an act of presumption. In September, the Allies, now encamped at Spire, were joined by 20,000 Dutch auxiliaries; the States General, notwithstanding the solicitations and menaces of France, being at last prevailed upon openly to declare themselves in favor of the Queen of Hungary. Marechal Noailles having retired into Alsace, the Allies, as if now pleased and proud to march about, made various random and fruitless incursions, and demolished the entrenchments already abandoned by the French on the banks of the Queich; after which they separated into winter-quarters *. Prince Charles of Lorraine also, being foiled in his attempts to penetrate into France on the side of Alsace, by the Marechal de Coigné, marched back to the Palatinate; and the campaign closed with no decisive advantage on either side. But Lord Stair, the English Commander in chief, immediately on the termination of it, threw up his commission in high disgust; determined not to lend the authority of his name to military operations, in the concerting and directing of which he had, by his own declaration, so little share. This celebrated Nobleman was one of the most remarkable, and, in all respects, one of the most accomplished personages of his time. He had, early in life, distinguished himself by his zeal in support of the Revolution, to the principles of which he continued ever steadily attached. Devoting himself to a military life, his valour and conduct were conspicuously displayed in the wars of the Revolution and Succession; and his knowledge and address being no less eminent than his courage, he was employed in various political negotiations, residing several years in a diplomatic capacity at the Courts of Warsaw and Versailles. During the regency of the Duke of Orleans, the Earl of Stair rose to the highest degree of favor, and was admitted to the most intimate confidence of that Prince, who, as we are told, upon some interesting political occasion, being asked what part his Royal Highness meant to take, replied, plied, with a smile, "Whatever the English Ambassador pleases." After passing through a variety of high offices, he was at length, in consequence of his determined opposition to the measures of Sir Robert Walpole, divested of all his employments; and, retiring to Scotland, lived upon his estate many years in dignified obscurity. But, on the formation of the Continental army, he was recalled in the most flattering and honorable manner, in order to be placed at the head of it: And it is by many believed that, if his plans had been adopted in their full extent, France would have found it difficult to resist the sudden and powerful impression which, in the spirit of a great commander, he is known to have meditated.

* “ Pour se convaincre (says the King of Prussia) du peu de suite qu’il y a dans les actions des hommes, il n’y a qu’à faire l’analyse de cette campagne. On assemble une armée sur le Mein, sans pourvoir à ses subsistances: La faim et la surprise obligent les Alliés à se battre; ils sont vainqueurs des François; ils passent le Rhin, ils vont à Worms; le Speyerbach les arrête, sans qu’il trouvent des expédiens pour en déposter les ennemis; ils avancent enfin sur le Speyerbach que M. de Noailles les abandonne, et ils ne reçoivent les secours des Hollandois que pour prendre des quartiers d’hiver dans le Brabant et dans le Westphalie.—Après quoi le Roi George prit le chemin de Londres, pour y faire à son Parlement, dans une harangue pompeuse, le récit de ses exploits.”—Oeuvres de Frederic II.

Early in the following spring, March 1744, war was formally declared by France against England; and, in a short time after, by England against France. In the declaration of France, the King of Great Britain was accused of a violation of his neutrality, and of having dissuaded the Court of Vienna from acceding to any terms of accommodation. "The war, says the King of Prussia, speaking of the situation of affairs at this period, had changed its object. The original idea of self-preservation on the part of the House of Austria had given place to projects of conquest. The success of the Court of Vienna had excited its ambition; and there was no longer room to doubt that the dethronement of the Emperor was in contemplation, and that the King of England secretly laboured to effect the same purpose." The mild, the equitable, and pacific Fleury, who, at the age of seventy, had assumed the reins of government in France, and had successfully directed the counsels of that great monarchy for a period of eighteen years, was now no more. And, in consequence of his demise, the Court of Versailles appeared far less solicitous to terminate the subsisting differences: And formal reciprocal declarations of war were now published by the Courts of Versailles and Vienna. In the former, his Most Christian Majesty charged the Queen of Hungary with "obstinate implacability, with a fixed determination not to listen to terms of accommodation, and with harbouring projects of insatiable ambition, hatred, and revenge." On the other hand, the Queen of Hungary charged his Most Christian Majesty with "a violation of his most solemn engagements respecting the Pragmatic Sanction; with insidiously inciting different pretenders to lay claim to the succession of the late Emperor; with endeavouring to instigate the common enemy of Christendom against her; and with having acted the part of a public incendiary in the north of Europe, in order that the Czarina might be prevented from assisting the House of Austria, while the armies of France were spreading desolation throughout the Empire." And all impartial persons persons were compelled to acknowledge, that the criminations and recriminations of these opposite declarations were, to the misfortune of mankind—oppressed by the ceaseless contentions of these proud rival Houses—strictly and literally true. Vast preparations were now made by the Court of Versailles for the ensuing campaign in Flanders, where an army of one hundred and twenty thousand men was assembled, under the command of the famous Marechal Comte de Saxe, who invested and reduced the towns of Menin, Ypres, and Furnes. The allied army, commanded by the Duke of Cumberland, a general of almost one whole year's experience, and very inferior to that of the French in force, was unable to impede the progress of his arms; which, however, received a sudden and unexpected check from the success of Prince Charles of Lorraine, who, having found means to elude the vigilance of Marechal Coigné, had crossed the Rhine at the head of a numerous army, had secured the passes of Lorraine, and laid the whole country under contribution. Forty thousand men being detached to reinforce the army in Alsace, the Allies ventured to approach the French commander, now acting on the defensive; but found no favorable opportunity of attack; and, after various inexplicable and inconsistent movements, they at length retired, without hazarding either siege or battle, into winter-quarters*.

In

* The French garrison at Lille, we are told, displayed their wit

In the mean time, all France was in consternation at the progress of the Austrians under the Prince of Lorraine, accompanied by the veteran Marechal Traun. The fate of the kingdom seemed involved in the issue of a battle. But their schemes of conquest were entirely frustrated by the alarming intelligence that the King of Prussia had a second time entered the dominions of the Queen of Hungary; that the city of Prague and all Bohemia had submitted almost without resistance, being entirely unsuspecting of danger, and consequently destitute of the proper means of defence. "Kings, says one of the most respectable writers of antiquity, have no reason to blame the people for changing for interest, since in that they do but imitate their masters, who are patterns of treachery and perfidiousness, and who think those men most capable of serving them who pay the least regard to honesty*." Scarcely were the ratifications of the treaty of Breslaw exchanged, before the treaty itself was violated by one of the parties, in the apprehension that it would eventually be violated by the other: And Silesia was destined to be once more deluged in blood, in order to determine whether it should be wit at the expense of the inactive warriors they could see from their walls. Harlequin was introduced upon the stage pompously exhibiting a bundle of papers under each arm: Being asked what he had under the right, he answered, orders; and what under the left, with equal solemnity—counter-orders.

* Plutarch in Vit. Pyrr.

subject

subject to the tyranny of Austria or Brandenburg. Prince Charles immediately prepared to march to the relief of Bohemia, and repassed, by the light of the full moon, the Rhine, in the face of the French army, commanded by the Mareschals de Coigné, Noailles, and Belleisle, who, it was suspected indeed, had still less inclination than ability to prevent his departure. The King of Prussia himself acknowledges, that the real motive of this invasion was his apprehension that the French would be compelled to conclude such a peace as the Austrian arrogance should prescribe; and that the whole force of the Queen of Hungary would afterwards be employed in the recovery of Silesia; relying, as he tells us, little on the guarantee of England; and knowing that the King of England, in a letter written in his own hand to the Queen of Hungary, had, in allusion to the conquest of Silesia, made use of this remarkable expression—"Madame, ce qui est bon à prendre est bon à rendre." The ostensible ground, however, for this hostile attack, was the restoration of the tranquillity of the Empire, and the just rights of the Emperor; for which purpose a treaty had been signed at Francfort May 22, 1744, in which the Emperor, the King of Prussia, the King of Sweden, as Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, and the Elector Palatine, were the "most high, and high contracting parties:" And by which they engaged themselves to oblige the Queen of Hungary to reinstate his Imperial Majesty in his Electoral dominions, to acknowledge the validity of his election, and to deliver up the archives of the Empire, still in her possession; and, by an article yet more alarming, to compel her Hungarian Majesty to submit the various claims relative to the Austrian succession to a regular juridical decision. And the King of Prussia, in his public rescript to M. D'Andrie, his Minister at the British Court, expressed his indignation at "the interference of Great Britain in the internal affairs of the Empire, and the unreasonableness of pretending, that such powerful and respectable Princes as those of the Empire, should be obliged to regulate their conduct according to the inclinations of those among the English who strive to make their countrymen enter into foreign quarrels, that are of no manner of concern to England *." The Prince of Lorraine, under the able direction of Marechal Traun, proceeded from the banks of the Rhine, with rapid marches, into Bohemia, where the Austrians were reinforced by twenty thousand Saxons; the King of Poland, Elector of Saxony, having signed with her
to

* By the treaty of Franefort, the Hessians, to whom such immense sums had been paid in subsidies during the years of peace, not only refused farther to co-operate with us as allies, but actually took a decided part in opposition to Great Britain, alarmed at the ambitious projects formed, with the concurrence of England, for the aggrandizement of the House of Austria.

Hungarian Majesty a convention for the mutual guarantee of their dominions. This sudden return of the Austrian army entirely disconcerted the projects of the Prussian Monarch, who, having advanced with some indiscretion towards the frontiers of the Arch-Dutchy, was himself in imminent danger of having his retreat intercepted by the skilful manœuvres of Marechal Traun : And finding this wary and cautious veteran constantly encamped in inaccessible situations, he had no other resource remaining than to abandon his conquests in Bohemia, and to gain the passes of Silesia, which he effected not without great difficulty and loss, leaving his heavy artillery and magazines in the hands of the enemy *.

Such, says the King of Prussia,

was
 * The King of Prussia had no expectation of the re-appearance of the Austrian army in Bohemia during this campaign, and highly resented the inactivity of the French Generals, who, notwithstanding the urgent remonstrances of the Prussian Minister Schmettau, made very faint and feeble efforts to impede the retreat of the Prince of Lorraine from the French territories; little impressed, as it should seem, with the arguments of the Court of Berlin, tending to shew the impolicy of this conduct. " Schmettau (says his Prussian Majesty) étoit désespéré de la mollesse des François. Il présentait des memoires au Roi, il pressoit les ministres, il écrivoit aux Maréchaux. Et quel risque couroit la France? Quand M. de Noailles auroit été battu, les troupes de la Reine étoient également obligées de quitter l'Alsace, et si les François étoient victorieux, ils détruisoient l'armée Autrichienne qui vivement poursuivie, au lieu de repasser ses ponts-du

was the end of a campaign, the commencement of which promised the most brilliant success ;” and in the conduct of which he, with a noble ingenuousness, confesses himself chargeable with a series of errors, while he applauds the skill and sagacity of his antagonist as worthy of the highest admiration. “ Mareschal Traun (says he) acted the part of Sertorius, and the King that of Pompey. The conduct of that commander in this campaign was a model of perfection, which every soldier who is attached to his profession ought to study and to imitate so far as he possesses the ability.” The King often mentioned this campaign as his ecole de la guerre, and Mareschal Traun as his military preceptor ; and the Prince of Lorraine, on his return to Vienna, was received with acclamations of applause, to which, though on all occasions he had displayed much personal gallantry, he had only a secondary claim.

During these transactions, Count Seckendorf, the Imperial General, being liberally supplied with subsidies from France, had found means to assemdu Rhin se feroit noyée dans ce fleuve. Les François emportèrent le village d'Achenheim, et s'amuserent a des formalités superflues, tandis que le Prince de Lorraine mit ce temps à profit pour repasser le Rhin sur ses ponts de Beinheim qu'il rompit avant l'aube du jour. Les François firent sonner des rodomontades ; et le Prince de Lorraine continua paisiblement sa marche par la Souabe et le haut Palatinat pour entrer en Boheme.”—Oeuvres de Frederic II.

ble

K. GEORGE II.

ble an army, with which he made an irruption into Bavaria, and the Emperor once more took possession of Munich, his capital. But this faint gleam of prosperity was of short duration: Knowing that the Austrians, now triumphant in Bohemia, were once more preparing to expel him from his hereditary dominions, destitute of resource, and overwhelmed with a succession of misfortunes, he expired at Munich January 18, 1745, of that most insupportable of sublunary ills—a broken heart; leaving to future ages a most striking and memorable example of the instability and vanity of human greatness*.

* No apology can be necessary for recalling to the public recollection the beautiful lines of the late Dr. Johnson relative to this Prince, in his masterly Imitation of the tenth Satire of Juvenal:

“The bold Bavarian in a luckless hour
Tries the dread summits of Cæsarean power—
With unexpected legions bursts away,
And sees defenceless realms receive his sway.
Short sway! fair Austria spreads her mournful charms,
The Queen, the beauty, sets the world in arms;
From hill to hill the beacons rousing blaze
Spreads wide the hope of plunder and of praise:
The fierce Croatian, and the wild hussar,
And all the sons of ravage, crowd the war.
The baffled Prince in honor’s flattering bloom
Of hasty greatness finds the fatal doom;
His foes’ derision, and his subjects’ blame—
And steals to death from anguish and from shame.”

The

K. GEORGE II.

The Grand Seignior, Mahmout V. had observed with exemplary and inviolable fidelity, during the troubles of the Queen of Hungary, the treaty recently concluded with the Emperor Charles VI. ; and, at this period, from the mere spontaneous impulse of generosity, he offered his mediation, in order to effect a general accommodation amongst the contending potentates of Christendom. For this purpose, the Grand Vizier delivered a rescript to the Ministers of the belligerent powers resident at the Porte, replete with sentiments of justice and humanity. " WAR is affirmed, in this memorial, to be the malady which infects Princes ; but how just soever they may be in their commencement, wars cannot, with any shadow of justice, be long continued, because the consequences that attend them are worse than the evils they meant to take away. The SUBLIME PORTE hoped, for these reasons, that the Princes of Christendom would have put an end to the war, in order to prevent such calamities : But being informed by the Ambassadors, Envoys, Residents, and Agents, settled here, that they are about to take the field with very numerous armies this campaign, from whence nothing can be expected but black events, it has been thought proper to represent to all the Ministers at the Court of the most gracious, most invincible, most puissant Emperor, the shadow of God upon earth, that, 1. This must occasion a vast effusion of human blood, and must must expose a multitude of innocent families to ruin and destruction. 2. That it must give a sanction to the breach of all laws human and divine, by attributing to force what ought to belong to right, and thereby confound all order, industry, and arts. 3. That it must prove the cause of interrupting commerce even amongst the subjects of such powers as are not engaged in war, to the great loss and detriment of the human species in general. That his Sublime Highness, having a tender sense of humanity, which is natural to all great minds, has judged it proper to interpose, and to endeavour to find out the means of compromising these differences. The Grand Visier, therefore, has thought it his duty to inform the respective powers at war of this most beneficent and laudable design in the sight of God and man of his Sublime Highness, in order to know their sentiments thereupon." It is superfluous to say, that this offer was wholly unavailable: It was doubtless regarded as a hopeless and impracticable task so to explain the complicated politics of the European courts, as to have made this ignorant barbarian comprehend what it was that the Christian Princes were quarrelling about.

In a short time after the death of the Emperor, the Austrian armies entered the Electorate of Bavaria; and the young Elector, unable to contend against such superior force, was compelled to abandon his capital, and retire to Augsburg; and a treaty was soon afterwards concluded at Fuessem between him and the Queen of Hungary, by which an entire restitution of her conquests was made by that Princess, in consequence of a relinquishment of all claims on the Austrian succession on the part of the Elector; and, which was of far greater importance, his voice in favour of the Grand Duke of Tuscany at the ensuing election of an Emperor of the Romans, and his acknowledgement of the validity of the electoral vote of Bohemia in the person of the Queen: And the Court of Vienna having now secured all the voices of the electoral college, those of Brandenburg and the Palatinate excepted, the Grand Duke was, on the second of September 1745, declared Emperor of the Romans at Francfort, by the name of Francis I. Although the campaign of 1744 had redounded little to the reputation of the Prussian arms, the political views of the King were in a great measure answered by it. The French regained the ascendant on the Rhine, where they captured, after an obstinate resistance, the Imperial city of Fribourg; and they were enabled to take the field in Flanders with redoubled force and vigour. The Prussian Monarch, on his part, opened the campaign of 1745 in Silesia at the head of seventy thousand men; and the Austrians and Saxons having penetrated into that province through the defiles of Landshut, the two armies joined battle at Friedburg, and after a furious rious conflict, maintained from the early dawn of morning till noon, the Austrians were defeated with great loss, and retiring into Bohemia, were followed thither by the King, whose career of victory shewed that he had no longer Marechal Traun for his adversary, that officer having been appointed to the command of the army of the Empire assembled for the protection of the Diet at Francfort. The Prussian Monarch however, conceiving himself abandoned by France, whose conquests on the Maese or the Scheld were, as he affirmed to his Most Christian Majesty, of no more advantage to Prussia than victories on the Scamander, would willingly have accommodated his differences with the Empress-Queen, by which appellation her Hungarian Majesty was now distinguished; but that Princess haughtily rejected his advances: And the Prince of Lorraine received positive orders from the Court of Vienna to risk another engagement. An opportunity offering itself of attacking the Prussians to advantage in their camp of Sohr, near Staudentz, a second pitched battle took place on the thirtieth of September; and though the Austrians seemed at first to have a fair prospect of success, forcing their way into the interior of the Prussian camp, and even carrying off the military chest and the King's own cabinet, they were finally repulsed. In this battle, the brother-princes Ferdinand and Louis of Brunswick were personally opposed posed to each other, and fought with an emulation of valour. Notwithstanding this victory, his Prussian Majesty thought proper to retire from Bohemia, which he always considered as an ineligible and hazardous scene of military operation, and entered the rich and fertile country of Lusatia. And the Saxons being defeated, December 15, by the Prince of Anhalt at Kesseldorf, his Polish Majesty was obliged to abandon the city of Dresden, of which his Prussian Majesty took immediate possession: And, in consequence of the continued successes of that Monarch, the Empress-Queen was at length induced to sign a treaty of peace at Dresden, January 1746, by which the King of Prussia acknowledged the Grand Duke of Tuscany as Emperor; the Electorate of Saxony, in consideration of the payment of one million of German crowns, was restored to his Polish Majesty, and Silesia once more guaranteed to Prussia. Vehement remonstrances were made by France against this treaty, which she affected to resent as a violation of the most solemn engagements. But it is sufficiently evident, that both France and Prussia, from the commencement to the termination of their political connection, were actuated entirely by the same motives; and that neither observed any faith with the other farther than it happened to be conformable to their own separate interest. “What is the real language, says the King of Prussia, of these remon-remonstrances of the Court of Versailles? Conti knows so well how to detain the principal forces of the Queen of Hungary in Germany, that he has repassed the Rhine, leaving any persons that pleased at liberty to elect an Emperor; that Traun has been enabled to detach Grune to Saxony, purposing to follow with the remainder of his troops, if the Queen of Hungary thinks fit to employ them against you. I have done great things this campaign. Mention also has been made of you: I regret the dangerous situation in which you are placed, for your attachment to me; but glory is to be acquired only by sacrificing yourself for France. Be firm and constant, and suffer without complaining. Imitate the example of my other allies, whom I have abandoned indeed, but to whom I have given alms when they have lost their possessions. You, without doubt, will have ability to extricate yourself from these embarrassments; but if unfortunately you should be brought to ruin, I will engage that the French academy shall compose the funeral oration of your empire." In a letter written with his own hand to the King of France, his Prussian Majesty thus apologises for his defection: "After the letter addressed to your Majesty in November last, I thought I had a right to expect from your Majesty real and effective succours. I do not enter into the reasons which may have induced your Majesty to abandon your allies to the caprice of fortune : For this time the valour of my troops has extricated me from the danger in which I found myself involved. Had I been overwhelmed by the number of my enemies, your Majesty would have contented yourself with lamenting my fate, and I should have been left destitute of resource. Your Majesty advises me to counsel myself : I have done so ; and I find that reason loudly proclaims the necessity of putting a speedy termination to a war which at present exists without an object, since the Austrians are no longer the invaders of Alsace, and an Emperor is actually chosen. Reason warns me to watch over my own safety ; and to consider the formidable armament preparing by Russia on the one side, and the army of Mareschal Traun advancing from the banks of the Rhine on the other. The Austrians and Saxons have sent their respective Ministers to this place to negotiate a peace, and I have no other option than to sign it. May I hope for the happiness of being employed by your Majesty to mediate a general pacification ? The interests of France cannot be confided to any person more attached to your Majesty than myself ; and I beseech your Majesty to believe, that the continuance of your friendship will be always dear and precious to me." France was in reality too deeply engaged in her favorite projects of conquest in the Low Countries, to entertain any serious intention of granting efficacious assistance to the King of Prussia.

Early in the year 1745, Mareschal Saxe, accompanied by the King and the Dauphin, took the field at the head of an immense army, and invested the important city of Tournay. The Allies, commanded by the Duke of Cumberland, assisted by Mareschal Konigseg and the Prince of Waldeck, though far inferior in number, determined to make an effort for the relief of the place. On the 11th of May, they advanced with great resolution to the attack of the French army, encamped under cover of the village of Fontenoy, and protected by a prodigious fire from the batteries they had planted on all sides. The enterprize was considered as a singular instance of military rashness. But such was the intrepidity displayed by the English and Hanoverian infantry, that the French were driven beyond their lines, and in imminent danger of a defeat; but the Dutch failing in their attempt on the village of Fontenoy, and the English General not making, as it is said, the proper use of his first success, by dividing the column of attack after he had broke the centre of the French, Mareschal Saxe had time to bring up his corps de reserve, and the English found themselves inclosed as it were within a circle of fire, from the redoubts which they had already passed, the masked batteries planted on each side, and the artillery, which, under the direction of Mareschal Saxe himself, played upon them with dreadful execution in front.

In this situation, the most heroic efforts were totally unavailing, and the Allies were compelled to retreat with the loss of more than ten thousand men, to which that of the French was supposed nearly equal; but the extent of the misfortune could be known only by the consequences. Tournay surrendered, after a gallant defence, by an honorable capitulation. Ghent and Bruges were captured by a coup de main: Ostend, Dendermond, Newport, and Aeth, were successively reduced; and the Allies retired for safety beyond the canal of Antwerp: And, at the end of the campaign, the King of France entered the city of Paris in triumph.

Towards the latter end of the summer, the French Court, desirous of causing an effectual diversion to the English army in Flanders, incited the son of the Chevalier de St. George, usually styled the Pretender, a young man of a sanguine and adventurous disposition, to risk an invasion of Great Britain, then almost destitute of troops, and in a state of great apparent dissatisfaction with the government. It is not necessary to enter into a very circumstantial narrative of this bold but abortive attempt. Prince Charles, as he was called by his adherents, landed in the Western Islands of Scotland in the month of August, the King of England being then at Hanover. The Lords of the Regency treated the first intelligence of his arrival as an idle tale; but, on receiving farther and undoubted doubted information that he had collected a considerable force, and was advancing southward, they issued a proclamation, offering a reward of thirty thousand pounds for his apprehension, and dispatched a messenger to the Continent to hasten the return of his Majesty, making, at the same time, a requisition of six thousand auxiliaries, which the Dutch were by treaty under obligation to furnish, and several British regiments were also recalled from the Netherlands. Instructions were sent to the Lords Lieutenants throughout the kingdom to array the militia in their several counties, and commissions were issued to levy new regiments for the speedy and effectual suppression of this rebellion. Many different corps of volunteers were incorporated; addresses were presented from all parts, testifying the utmost abhorrence of this attempt to subvert the government; and, notwithstanding the previous symptoms of discontent, the whole kingdom seemed united as one man in the moment of danger, in support of the national religion, laws, and constitution. Sir John Cope, commander in chief of the forces in North Britain, advanced at the head of what troops he could collect to Inverness, in order to oppose the farther progress of this adventurer, who, in the mean time, marched by another route to the capital, which surrendering to him without resistance September 16, 1745, he caused his father to be proclaimed claimed King of Great Britain at the high cross of Edinburgh, declaring himself, at the same time, regent of his dominions, and fixing his head-quarters at the palace of Holyrood-house, the royal residence of his ancestors. On receiving this intelligence, Sir John Cope hastened back to Edinburgh; and, on the twentieth of September, he encamped with his army, consisting of about three thousand regular troops, near the village of Prestonpans, in the environs of the capital. Early the next morning, he was attacked, sword in hand, by the Prince Regent, at the head of about an equal number of Highlanders, who, in less than ten minutes, entirely broke the King's troops, unaccustomed to their ferocious and terrific mode of fighting. Sir John Cope was heavily censured for his presumption and ignorance on this occasion. Colonel Gardiner, an officer of distinguished merit, and himself a native of Scotland, remonstrating with him on the impropriety of the disposition he had made, was treated with neglect and rudeness, and predicted a total defeat, which, however, he disdained to survive, falling gloriously, covered with wounds, in the midst of the enemy, and in sight of his own mansion. In consequence of this victory, the pretended Prince Regent saw himself absolute master of Scotland, a few fortresses excepted. He received large supplies from France, and was joined by the Lords Kilmarnock, Cromarty, marty, Balmerino, and many other persons of rank and distinction; and the enterprize, romantic as it originally appeared, began to wear a serious aspect. The Campbells, the Monroes, the Macdonalds, and other loyal clans, assembled, however, in arms, in defence of the government, under the Earl of Loudon. An army was collected in England under General Wade, who received orders to march to the north, and proceeded as far as Newcastle. The Prince Pretender, however, resolving to try his fortune in the south, took the route of Carlisle, which surrendered to him in November. Another army, under Sir John Ligonier, was now forming in Staffordshire: Notwithstanding which, the Prince determined to proceed, hoping for a co-operation from a body of French forces on the southern coast, and not doubting but he should be joined by great numbers of the English malcontents in his progress through the kingdom. In this expectation, however, he was grievously disappointed; at Manchester, only, was he received with any demonstrations of joy. Crossing the Mersey at Stockport, he advanced through Macclesfield and Congleton to Derby, which was the extreme point of his progress; for, understanding that the King had determined to take the field in person, and to set up the standard of England on Finchley Common—the Earl of Stair, Field-Marshal of Great Britain, being, at this momentous crisis, again received into favor and confidence, and appointed General of the royal army—he took a sudden resolution, though he had actually advanced within a few days march of the metropolis, to provide for his safety by a retreat. This amounted plainly to a virtual relinquishment of his object, which, indeed, could only be accomplished by a series of desperate efforts, crowned with continual and decisive success. A single disaster must, in his situation, be fatal. No sooner was the resolution formed for retreating to the north, than it was carried into effect with almost incredible diligence and celerity. Abandoning Derby December 6, their vanguard entered Manchester on the ninth, and on the nineteenth they reached Carlisle; and, after reinforcing the garrison at that place, the rebel army crossed the rivers Eden and Solway into Scotland, with all their artillery and military stores, eluding the attempts of both the adverse armies to intercept them on this memorable march, in which no violence was offered, no outrage or rapine committed, in a country abounding with plunder, and presenting every temptation to the unrestrained indulgence of military rapacity. On the twenty-first of December Carlisle was invested by the Duke of Cumberland, who had now assumed the chief command, and surrendered on the thirtieth at discretion. In the mean time, the Prince Regent proceeded to Glasgow, from which place he exacted heavy contributions, butions, in revenge for the loyalty they had displayed in the course of the rebellion; after which he invested the castle of Stirling, though with little prospect of success. General Hawley, now at the head of the King's forces in North Britain, marched to Falkirk, in order to relieve this fortress by an attack upon the rebels. On the seventeenth of January 1746, however, the General was himself unexpectedly attacked by them, and, after sustaining for some time a disorderly and irregular fight, was compelled to a precipitate retreat, not, indeed, suffering so much loss as disgrace, it having been customary with him to boast that, with two regiments of dragoons, he would drive the rebel army from one end of the kingdom to the other. The Duke of Cumberland in person being now arrived at Edinburgh with large reinforcements, took upon him the command, and moving towards Linlithgow, the rebels not only abandoned the siege of Stirling castle, but passed the Forth with evident symptoms of consternation; and the Prince Pretender still continuing to advance northward, the Duke of Cumberland, after securing the important passes of Stirling and Perth, advanced to Aberdeen. This changeful drama now drew towards a termination. In the beginning of April (1746) the Duke began his march from Aberdeen, and, on the twelfth, passed the deep and rapid river Spey, in sight of the advanced posts of the enemy, without opposition.

favor

tion. At Nairne, his Royal Highness received intelligence that the Prince Pretender had advanced from Inverness to Culloden, in order to give him battle. On the sixteenth, the Duke decamped from Nairne early in the morning, and, after a march of nine miles, perceived the rebel army drawn up in battalia in thirteen divisions. About one in the afternoon the engagement began, and the Highlanders attempted, as formerly at Preston-pans, to break the royal troops, by rushing down with their broad-swords and Lochaber axes; but being now prepared for this mode of fighting, they received the enemy with fixed bayonets, and kept up a continual firing by platoons, which did prodigious execution. Being thrown into visible disorder, the cavalry of the royal army attacked them in flank, and, in less than thirty minutes, the battle was converted into a general rout; and, orders being issued to give no quarter, vast numbers were slain in the pursuit. It is even affirmed, that unnecessary and wanton barbarities were committed on the persons and families of the rebels long after the cessation of resistance; and that the Duke of Cumberland sullied the glory of his victory, by displaying a savage thirst of revenge, and a courage untinged with the feelings of humanity. As, nevertheless, the temper and conduct of this Prince were upon no other occasion tainted with this imputation, it is reasonable to believe, either that he was transported into these temporary excesses by that rage which is so frequent and horrid a concomitant and characteristic of civil discord; or that he really conceived these severities to be necessary for the prevention of farther resistance on the part of the rebels. The Pretender escaped with great difficulty from the field of battle; and after wandering for the space of many months a wretched and solitary fugitive among woods and lakes and mountains, and passing through a series of the most extraordinary and romantic adventures, to be paralleled only by those of King Charles II. after the battle of Worcester, he found means, on the twentieth of September, to embark on board a small vessel, which conveyed him to Morlaix, in Bretagne. The executions which ensued on the suppression of this rebellion seemed much more numerous than the necessity of the case required; and the Lords Balmerino, Lovat*, and Kilmarnock, suffered the sentence of decapitation on Tower Hill, as did also the Earl of Derwentwater, without any form of trial, being arraigned on the sentence passed against him in 1716. The Earl of Cromarty only received a pardon. Both Houses of Parliament presented addresses of congratulation to his Majesty, and of thanks to his Royal Highness the Duke, on this auspicious occasion. The sum of twenty-five thousand pounds per annum was added, by the House of Commons, to the revenue of the Duke, now become the idol of the nation, and extolled as equal to the most illustrious of its heroes.
was

* Lord Lovat, who was of a character infamously profligate, suffered with great dignity and resolution: "So much easier is it, says Sir Dudley Carleton on a similar occasion, for a man to die well than to live well."

During these transactions in England, the triumphs of Mareschal Saxe in Flanders still continued. The King of France again taking the field in person, invested the city of Antwerp, which surrendered after a very slight resistance. Mons made a better defence, but was compelled to capitulate before the end of June: And St. Guislain and Charleroy shared the fate of Mons and Antwerp. On the second of December (1746) the trenches were opened before Namur, and, on the twenty-third, that strong and important fortress, after an unavailing effort previously made by the Prince of Lorraine, who now commanded the confederate army, for its relief, surrendered to the arms of France. On the thirtieth of September, Mareschal Saxe crossed the Jaar, behind which river the Allies were posted, near the village of Roucoux, in order to force them to a battle. After an obstinate conflict, in which the Prince of Waldeck displayed heroic bravery, the Allies were obliged to abandon their posts with the loss of five thousand men and thirty pieces of artillery, and retire to Maestricht; and this action terminated the campaign.

campaign. A singular instance of presence of mind is recorded on this occasion of the Earl of Crawford, who, being attended by his aide-du-camp and a few dragoons, had rode out the morning preceding the battle to reconnoitre the situation of the enemy, and fell in unexpectedly with one of their advanced guards: The sergeant who commanded it immediately ordered his men to present their pieces; but the Earl, without the slightest emotion, told him there was no occasion for that ceremony, and inquired if he had seen any of the enemies parties; and, being answered in the negative, replied, “Très bien—tenez vous sur vos gardes—et si vous étiez attaqué, j’aurai soin que vous soyez soutenu*.” This incident coming to the knowledge of Mareschal Saxe, that Commander dismissed an officer on his parole with a complimentary message to the Earl, assuring him “that he could not pardon the sergeant for not procuring him the honor of his Lordship’s company to dinner.” The States of Holland began now to be seriously alarmed at the progress of the French, and declared themselves determined to carry on the war with increase of vigor.

In March 1747, the allied forces took the field under the command of the Duke of Cumberland; the Prince of Waldeck and the Mareschal Bathiani conducting the Dutch and Austrian troops under him. The whole army amounted to more than one hundred thousand men. But, on account of the unusual inclemency of the weather, Mareschal Saxe remained in his cantonments, contenting himself with obstructing the supplies of the allied army, and publicly declaring he would teach the Duke of Cumberland, when his forces were sufficiently diminished by hunger and sickness, that it is the first duty of a General to provide for the health and preservation of his troops. In April, the French Commander detached Count Lowendahl, at the head of thirty thousand men, to invade Dutch Flanders; and Sluys, Sas-van-Ghent, and Hulst, were quickly reduced. The French General now prepared for a descent on Zealand; and the whole Dutch nation being seized with extreme consternation, violent popular commotions took place throughout all the provinces. The people at large, ever attached to the House of Orange, and mindful of the important services rendered to the republic by that illustrious family, insisted upon the Prince of Orange's being immediately invested with the dignity of Stadtholder; and the States General not chusing, or not daring, to oppose the general sense of the nation, the Prince was on the second day of May (1747) declared Stadtholder, and Captain-General and Admiral of the United Provinces; and, in the course of the ensuing year, the the dignity was made hereditary in the House of Orange. Upon this change in affairs, many spirited resolutions passed in the Assembly of the States. An augmentation of the army was decreed, the peasants were armed and exercised, inquiries were instituted into the conduct of the Governors who had surrendered the towns on the frontier, and hostilities were denounced against France both by sea and land. Marechal Saxe, regardless of these internal changes and commotions, advanced with the grand army to Louvaine; and the Duke of Cumberland took post at Laffeldt, near Val, in order to cover the city of Maestricht. The Marechal determined upon a general attack, in order to dislodge the enemy, and open the way to Maestricht. The Allies defended themselves with great resolution and perseverance: The French were repeatedly broken and dispersed; but fresh brigades continually succeeded to those which retired, and the village was three times lost and recovered: At length, the line being dangerously disordered by an impetuous assault of the French cavalry, the Duke ordered a retreat, which was effected with inconsiderable loss, chiefly through the extraordinary intrepidity and presence of mind of Sir John Ligonier, who, at the head of a few British regiments of dragoons and squadrons of Imperial horse, arrested the pursuit of the whole French army. He was himself, his horse being killed under him, made prisoner; but the regiments he commanded retired unbroken from the field. When this officer was introduced to the presence of his Most Christian Majesty, that Monarch exclaimed, "When, Sir, will the King your master deign to grant us peace?" And he was soon released on his parole, intrusted with certain general propositions of a pacific tendency, for the consideration of the English Court.

* Very well—be upon your guard; and, if you are attacked, I will take care that you shall be supported.

The military arrangements of the Commander in chief were the subject of much censure on this occasion. When the French first appeared on the heights of Herdeeren, the Marechal Bathiani urged the necessity of an immediate attack, but his advice was received with coldness and neglect; and the Commander in chief asking the Marechal where he might be found in case of need, the Austrian haughtily replied, that he should always be found at the head of his troops*. The Allies however, notwithstanding their late defeat, were still able to cover Maestricht from attack; and Marechal Saxe perceiving his original project disconcerted, detached Count Lowendahl, with about

* We are told, that a French officer remarking to an English private, who had been made prisoner after displaying extraordinary marks of valor, that if there had been fifty thousand such men as he in the allied army they should have found it very difficult to conquer them; the Englishman replied, "there were men enough like me, but we wanted one like Marechal Saxe."

fifty thousand men, to lay siege to Bergen-op-Zoom, the strongest fortification of Dutch Brabant, and accounted almost impregnable, being the chef-d'œuvre of the famous engineer Coehorn. The enemy appeared before the walls on the twelfth of July, and from this time to the middle of September, a tremendous scene of carnage was exhibited. The roar of bombs, mortars, and cannon, was incessantly heard, and all the dreadful apparatus of war displayed. Baron Cronstrom, a gallant old veteran, being appointed to the command of the fortrefs, repeated and desperate sallies were made by the garrison, and mines sprung with horrible success. It was generally believed that Count Lowendahl would be obliged to abandon his enterprise; but some inconsiderable breaches being made in a ravelin and two adjoining bastions, the Count determined upon an assault. The Governor not imagining the breaches practicable, had taken no precautions to guard against the attack, which was made with astonishing intrepidity on the night of the sixteenth of September. The success of the attempt justified the apparent rashness of it. The French gained the ramparts, and formed, before the garrison could assemble. The Baron being awakened from his sleep, was informed that the French were in possession of the town, and with difficulty effected his own escape. Thus the enemy became entire masters of the navigation of the Scheldt. Lowendahl was promoted, in consequence of this success, to the rank of Marechal of France, and the King of France returned once more in triumph to Versailles. Notwithstanding the successes of the French in Flanders, they began to feel the continuation of the war extremely burdensome; they had suffered great losses at sea; their navy had sustained repeated shocks; their commerce was ruined; their finances exhausted; the war in Italy had proved disastrous; the views of the French Monarch in Germany were entirely frustrated; the election of a Stadtholder had armed against him the whole power of Holland; and he knew that the Courts of London and Vienna were in treaty with the Czarina, who had actually issued orders for the march of forty thousand Russians from the banks of the Wolga to the borders of the Rhine. Moved by these considerations, his Most Christian Majesty made direct and repeated advances of accommodation to the Courts of London and of the Hague; and, though they were at first received with coldness, it was finally agreed that a congress should be opened at Aix la Chapelle, and which accordingly met early in the ensuing spring, March 1748, the Earl of Sandwich and Sir Thomas Robinson acting as Ambassadors Plenipotentiary from the King of Great Britain. After the conferences commenced, Marechal Saxe, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the Allies, invested the city of Maestricht; but the

the preliminaries of peace being signed in the space of a few weeks, hostilities were suspended, and the city, which had been defended by the Governor, Baron d'Alva, with such skill and gallantry that the besiegers had made little progress, was happily preserved.

We are now to resume the narration of the domestic and political transactions of Great Britain, which has suffered great interruption through this long, but necessary, detail of foreign military operations. After the resignation of Sir Robert Walpole, Lord Carteret succeeded to all the plenitude of ministerial power, and he even seemed to enjoy the favor and confidence of the Sovereign in a degree superior to his predecessor. The nation, however, heavily complained that the war with Spain was become a secondary object, or, rather, was wholly neglected, while the affairs of the Continent only engrossed the attention of the Court, and of the Minister, who had entirely forgotten his former eloquent declamations and invectives against standing armies, votes of credit, foreign subsidies, Continental connections; and whose speeches now breathed only glory, conquest, and defiance to France.

A very courtly address being moved in the House of Peers, December 1743, in reply to his Majesty's speech from the throne, "recommending measures of vigor, and demanding supplies to enable him to enter into such engagements with other powers as might be necessary for the support of his allies, and the restoration of the balance of Europe ;” the Earl of Chesterfield rose, and expressed his hope that by vigorous measures were not intended such wild attempts and romantic expeditions as might hazard the national honor and safety, without the possibility of advantage ; that we were not called upon to squander millions, and stain the fields of the Continent with the blood of our countrymen, without being fully informed concerning the end and object of the war ; that we were not to stand alone against the united power of the House of Bourbon, and sacrifice our lives and fortunes for those who will not endeavour to defend themselves. The true interest of England, my Lords, said this Nobleman, is to be at peace with its neighbours ; for peace is the parent of prosperity ; and, when I find the Governors of a nation inclined to war, I am always ready to ask them, by what mode of calculation they can compute the costs, or ascertain the consequences ; and I think it my duty to warn them against such counsels as may precipitate their country into an abyss of poverty and ruin. When I hear a proposal for declaring war, I figure to myself a suspension of commerce, a decay of wealth, an increase of taxes, a state of impatience, anxiety, and discontent. Should the war prove unsuccessful, the acrimony of revenge will strongly incite us to the the continuance of it. If it be prosperous, we shall be easily deluded into the imagination that the empty glitter of military glory is preferable to the plenty and tranquillity of peace; and that we flourish as a nation when we adorn our public halls with the standards and ensigns of Spain and France. To these general maxims, however, the conduct of the present Ministers, said his Lordship, may perhaps be cited as an exception; for, though the war with Spain is the only war desired by the people, and the only war which it is their interest to prosecute, they who have assumed the management of our affairs appear neither fired by revenge, nor irritated by disgrace, at the losses and disappointments we have sustained in the progress of it. This war, so important to our commercial interests, only has been neglected—this alone has been forgotten. We have been told of the danger which may arise to the State from the boldness of political discussion—“flagrante bello ;” but, my Lords, who does not see that the expression is inapplicable, and that the noble Secretary should have said languente bello ? Spain, weak and defenceless as she is, laughs at our armaments, and perceives no other consequence from our declaration of war than a greater license of plunder, and a more easy distribution of prizes.”

The Minister, in a speech of great ability and eloquence, attempted to defend the measures of his administration. " He called the attention of the House to the state of affairs on the Continent a few summers past, when the Empire was over-run by the arms of France; when the Queen of Hungary was attacked by Prussia on the one side, and Bavaria on the other; when, to secure her person from captivity, she was compelled to abandon her capital, and her condition was considered as hopeless and irretrievable. To the powerful assistance of Great Britain alone is it owing, said he, that the armies of France have been obliged, with disgraceful precipitation, to evacuate the Empire; that her ally, the Emperor, is left, without succour, a helpless spectator of the conquest of his hereditary dominions; and that Prussia is converted from a dangerous enemy into a firm friend and ally. Such had been the success, and such the consequences, of the measures which he had recommended, and of which he now with confidence demanded the approbation and vigorous support of that illustrious Assembly. Armies are only to be repelled by armies, and they who engage in war must resolve to sustain the calamities inseparable from it. In the present conjuncture, no measures can be called wise or prudent which are not vigorous. By vigor only can the House of Austria be restored, and by the restoration of the House of Austria only can the balance of power be preserved. That the war against Spain had been either negligently or unsuccessfully cessfully prosecuted the Minister positively denied : At this moment we blockaded both her fleets and her armies. It was known to all Europe that the Spanish Generals in Italy were continually embarrassed and impeded in all their enterprizes by the operations of the British fleet. And it is not, perhaps, easy to conceive a more destructive method of carrying on war than that of shutting up an army in an enemy's country, where it cannot be succoured, and from which it cannot be recalled ; no prospect remaining but that of perishing by hardships and famine. But Spain is not the adversary against which our force ought chiefly to be directed : There is an enemy nearer and more formidable—an enemy which, equally in war and peace, endeavors our destruction—an enemy so insidious, that the utmost friendship which can subsist between us is only an intermission of hostility—an enemy whose perpetual object it is in all her designs and transactions, whether she ratifies or violates treaties, whether she offers mediation or foment discord, whether she courts or insults her neighbours, to weaken and depress all other powers, and to exalt herself to universal dominion. The ambition and pride of France, infatuated as that nation is with the glory of their monarch and the desire of aggrandizing their empire, are permanent and hereditary. If one King dies, another succeeds to the same views ; and if a Minister be removed, it is because they hope the grand
admi-

design

design of enslaving the world will be more actively carried on by another. Against such an enemy, if it be necessary to make war, it is surely necessary to prosecute it with our utmost force; because war is a calamity to which a desirable and secure termination can be put only by success, and success is only to be obtained by vigor. It is yet, my Lords, happily in our power to check them in their career, and fix, it may be hoped, more lasting barriers of empire, which shall for ever destroy that thirst of boundless dominion which has given so much disturbance to mankind." Such were the glowing colors with which this eloquent Statesman had the art to varnish over the rashness and absurdity of his measures; and such the arguments by which the House was induced to give its sanction to the proposed address.

A motion being made in the House of Commons for the discharge of the Hanoverian mercenaries, Mr. Pitt contended, with much warmth, "that there existed no necessity of hiring auxiliary troops, since it had never been shewn that either justice or policy required us to engage in the quarrels of the Continent. The Minister, he said, affected to speak of the balance of power, the Pragmatic Sanction, the preservation of the Queen of Hungary, as if England only were concerned in re-establishing the House of Austria in its former grandeur, and that the power of France were formidable to Great Britain tain alone. The King of England, no less in his electoral than his regal capacity, had guaranteed the Pragmatic Sanction, and the troops hired by England were, no less than ourselves, allies of the Queen of Hungary. Supposing the assistance granted to the Queen of Hungary a matter of right and justice, due by solemn treaty, Hanover is equally bound with us to observe the terms of this treaty: Or, if it be an act of mere generosity, why should the Elector of Hanover display his generosity at the expense of the people of England? But the transactions of every year exhibited proofs of this perfidious partiality. Few of the Members of that House, it might be presumed, had forgotten the ever-memorable treaty, of which the tendency was discovered in the name—the treaty of Hanover; by which we disunited ourselves from Austria, destroyed that building which we may now endeavor in vain to raise again, and weakened the only power which it was our interest to strengthen. He declared, in animadverting on that paragraph of the King's speech which called the attention of Parliament to the late change of affairs in Europe, that we had indeed felt a very remarkable change; from one extreme we had run to the utmost verge of another. Our former Minister betrayed the interest of his country by his pusillanimity; our present Minister sacrificed it by his Quixotism. Instead of acceding to every treaty however dishonorable, we now refuse to listen to any, however reasonable. In other respects, the nation had experienced no change, notwithstanding the change of a few individuals in the administration; for the same prodigal, corrupt, adulatory spirit, still pervaded all the departments of government. He affirmed, that we ought to have advised the Queen of Hungary to have accepted the terms of the King of Prussia, when he first invaded Silesia: Nay, we ought to have insisted on it, as the condition of our assisting her against any of the other claimants. Had we done this, the Court of Vienna must have acceded to it, and the Queen of Hungary would have retained, in all human probability, firm possession of her other dominions; and the Duke of Lorraine would have been elevated to the Imperial throne. Instead of this, we encouraged the Court of Vienna in its obstinacy, and gave the Queen of Hungary reason to believe that we would support her against all the world, though, when Hanover appeared to be in danger, we immediately abandoned the interests of Austria, and co-operated with France to exalt the Elector of Bavaria to the dignity of Emperor. The accommodation between Austria and Prussia, and the subsequent successes of the Queen of Hungary, afforded us a fair opportunity of concluding the war. Peace was proposed by the Emperor and France upon the moderate terms of uti possidetis; but we were so far from advising the Queen

now

Queen of Hungary to accept, that there is good reason to believe we advised her not to accept, of the terms offered. Nothing now would satisfy us but the conquest of Alsace and Lorraine, to serve as an equivalent for Silesia; though a general jealousy now prevailed of the ambitious designs of Austria, which would effectually preclude any effort on the part of the Princes of Germany in the prosecution of that romantic scheme. Deceived as the Queen of Hungary had before been, she trusted, strange as it may seem, a second time to our delusive promises; though I will venture to prophesy that, whenever Hanover shall be a second time endangered, she will find herself a second time deceived. The temerity of our counsels was equalled only by the timidity and feebleness of our operations: The whole campaign would have passed in supine inactivity, had not the French found an opportunity, through the misconduct of our Generals, to attack us in a situation which exposed our whole army, and the person of his Majesty, to the most imminent hazard of captivity or destruction: Thank God! the courage of some of the French Generals so far exceeded the limits of discretion, as to cause them voluntarily to relinquish the advantage they possessed, and the whole French army, after suffering a severe repulse, were compelled to retire with precipitation over the Maine: But, instead of pursuing a flying enemy, we hastened our own retreat to Hanau, leaving our slain unburied on the field, and our wounded to the mercy of the enemy. This action may therefore, on our side, be called a lucky escape; but I shall never give my consent to honor it with the name of a victory. When the French at length repassed the Rhine at the approach of Prince Charles of Lorraine, was any thing done by the allied army? I know of nothing but the exploit of sending a party of hussars into Lorraine with a manifesto, though the Dutch auxiliaries had then joined our army. But had we been seconded by the whole power of Holland, instead of a small detachment of their forces, the vast schemes we have formed would have been equally impracticable, and I should only have lamented that this wise republic had become insane through our example. I could wish erased from the annals and records of our history all mention of the famous treaty of Worms. By that destructive and ridiculous measure we have taken upon ourselves a burden which it is impossible to support; and we have involved ourselves in the guilt of such an act of injustice towards Genoa as must alarm all Europe, and give the French a signal advantage. From thence all Europe will see what regard we have to equity when we think we have power, and have shewn how much it is the general interest to prevent its increase. I hope, therefore, we shall now see the necessity of putting a stop to the farther prosecution of these dangerous and ruinous projects. If we put a negative upon this question, it may awaken Ministers out of their delusive dream; if we agree to it, they will dream on until they have dreamed Europe and their country, as well as themselves, into perdition *."
own

of

The same question which had been agitated with equal or greater warmth in the House of Peers, was, in the course of the Session, renewed with a slight variation in point of form. And the Lords in opposition indulged themselves in vehement, although historic impartiality must pronounce them for the most part captious and groundless, invectives against the conduct of these mercenaries, and the gross partiality pretended to be shewn them on all occasions. They were declared to be a burden on the nation, equally hateful and ignominious, and more the objects of political detestation than the enemies against whom they were employed ; and the whole system of Continental and Hanoverian politics became again the theme of the severest animadversion. The Earl of Halifax, a young Nobleman distinguished by his political and personal accomplishments, expressed, in warm and eloquent language, " his indignation that England should be condemned to waste the treasure and the lives of its inhabitants in quarrels which either did not at all regard its interests, or regarded them only remotely and consequentially. He declared himself unable to discover for what reason we, who were not principals in the war, and have no separate interest to promote, should hire mercenaries to carry it on, at an immense and intolerable expense. We are now contending, said this Nobleman, not for our rights and privileges—not for our persons, our liberty, or our property. We are attempting by force of arms to fix what the course of events is ever tending to unfix—the balance of Europe. The balance of Europe has a powerful and fascinating sound, which has been frequently employed to subject this nation to the oppressive exactions of foreign powers. When the people complain of the load of taxes, and the perpetual increase of burdens, of which they were never able to perceive any effect, or derive any advantage, they are stilled with the necessity of supporting the balance of Europe.

* The characters of the two Ministers, Walpole and Carteret, were contrasted by a political writer of this period with extraordinary felicity, in the following passage from Cicero, originally applied to Cæsar and Antony with his associates:

"An vos estis, ulla re cum eo comparandi? Fuit in illo ingenium, ratio, memoria, literæ, cura, cogitatio, diligentia. Multos annos regnare meditatus, magno labore quod cogitarat, effecerat: Muneribus, monumentis, congiariis, multitudinem imperitam delenierat, suos præmiis, adversarios clementiæ specie devinxerat—quid multa? attulerat jam liberæ civitati partim metu, partim patientia, consuetudinem serviendi. Cum illo ego vos dominandi cupidine comparare possum, cæteris vero rebus nullo modo estis comparandi."

Europe. When they cry aloud for justice against their domestic oppressors—when they demand that the deceivers and flatterers of the Prince should be brought to punishment—and the proper interests of the nation alone diligently and faithfully pursued, they are censured and stigmatized as wretches ignorant of the true principles of policy, and who have no regard to the balance of Europe. The folly and guilt of this conduct were not unknown during the last administration to the noble Lord who now assumed the direction of foreign affairs, and was reprobated by him with generous warmth and all the appearance of honest detestation. But we have often seen that opinions are variable with other human things. The system of the noble Lord is now entirely changed, and, to use the language of the medical charlatan, the heart is removed to the other side.

Lord Carteret, with his accustomed energy of language and plausibility of argument, entered into an elaborate defence of his ministerial conduct. He declared, “that a proposition to withdraw all our forces from the Continent, and, instead of courting danger in foreign countries, to sleep in security till we are awakened by an alarm upon our own coasts, would be far less unreasonable than the motion actually before the House; for, doubtless, it is better to enjoy peace, however precarious, than to carry on a war with certainty of defeat, and to rush into the field of battle only to be overborne by the number of our enemies. Is it seriously meant that we are to neglect all the rules of war and all the maxims of policy, and to set our enemies at defiance, expecting assistance from causes invisible or præternatural? The Lords who support the motion must know, that a compliance with it would be virtually to yield up all for which WILLIAM and MARLBOROUGH fought—all which can secure our own independence or the liberties of the Continent. The topics enlarged upon by the noble Lords, of numerous armies and burdensome expenses, are such as will always raise a declaimer high in the esteem of the people, whose sufferings he appears to compassionate, and whose cause he professes to defend; and measures, however necessary and however just, must be unpopular for a time, of which the expense is immediate and the advantage distant. It is the opinion of some, that, from the nature of our situation, we may bid defiance to the rest of mankind, and, from our rocks and floating castles, look with unconcern and tranquillity upon all the commotions of the European kingdoms; but if any one monarchy has, by any means, arisen to such an height of grandeur as to make it justly formidable to the rest of Europe, threatening the eventual subversion of all the kingdoms on the Continent, surely Great Britain has more cogent reasons than any other nation nation to endeavor the suppression of such a power, because of all nations she has most to lose; and, being farthest exalted above slavery, must feel proportionate pain from political depression. But this purpose can be effected only by supporting on the Continent some power capable of opposing the ambitious projects of France; and it is universally admitted, that the House of Austria alone can be deemed of weight to be placed in the balance against the House of Bourbon. If the House of Austria is to be supported, we must submit to the expense necessary for its support. Nothing, therefore, can be more improper than this motion, unless it were intended that the cause of general liberty should be instantly and totally abandoned, and that we should submissively consign to France the fate of ourselves and our posterity. By the disseminations of falsehood and malignity the nation has been irritated, and discontent has, indeed, too generally prevailed: But, by the same arts, the same odium might and would have attended any other scheme; and the present clamor will, in a short time, give way to the force of reason and truth. Upon a former occasion, in which the neutrality of Hanover was the subject of discussion, I observed that, if England were to be steered by that Electorate, it were necessary that the rudder should be separated from the ship. This was then my opinion; for then, my Lords, England was subservient to Hanover : But Hanover is now subservient to England, and regulated by our measures ; for who can doubt but a neutrality might have been easily obtained for that Electorate ? but his Majesty scorned to exempt himself from hazard, by countenancing the claims of ambition, and would not forbear to assist his ally only because her distress was urgent, and her danger imminent. It is evident, upon the whole, then, my Lords, that the war has been conducted with wisdom and success—that the troops of Hanover were not retained but by the counsel and authority of the legislature—that they have been eminently useful in contributing to the expulsion of the armies of France—that, though objections more worthy of notice could be produced, those troops cannot, at this juncture, be dismissed, because other troops cannot be obtained so soon as the exigencies of the war require.”

The question was at length put, and the motion rejected by a majority of eighty-six Peers against forty-six : But a very strong protest was signed by the minority, and the measure was manifestly carried in both Houses by the influence of the Court, against the unanimous voice of the nation, which loudly exclaimed against the interested ambition and political apostacy of the Minister, who had now involved himself and his country too deeply in in the quarrels of the Continent to be able to recede either with honor or with safety.

In the course of this important and interesting Session, the House of Commons, apprised of the recent machinations of the Court of St. Germain's, sent up to the Lords a bill, making it high treason to correspond with the sons of the Pretender. On the commitment of this bill, the Lord Chancellor Hardwick moved, that the committee be instructed to receive a clause for continuing the penalties and forfeitures legally incurred by the descendants of traitors, to the death of the sons of the Pretender, and which, by the operation of an act passed in the reign of Queen Anne, expired with the Pretender himself. On which the Duke of Bedford arose, and, in a very able manner, stated his reasons for refusing his assent to the motion. "His Grace declared his zeal for the security of the Constitution, and of the settlement of the Crown in the present family, to be in no degree inferior to that of any of their Lordships: And he expressed his conviction that a Prince forced upon us by the armies and fleets of France would be only the viceroy of the monarch to whom he owes his exaltation. Nevertheless, said this Nobleman, your Lordships will not be surpris'd that I am alarmed at the prospect of a law like this. I, whose family has suffered so lately the deprivation of its rank and fortune by the tyranny of a court—whose grandfather was cut off by an unjust prosecution—and whose father was condemned for many years to see himself divested of the rights of his birth, which were at length restored to him by more equitable judges;—it is surely reasonable, my Lords, that I should oppose the extension of penalties to the descendants of offenders, who have scarcely myself escaped the blast of an attainder*. Whatever may be the malice of our enemies, the ill success of past attempts is a convincing proof that government can have no just cause of fear; that recourse, therefore, need not be had to new degrees of severity, or the enacting penal laws of an extraordinary kind, to prevent that which experience has shewn impossible to be accomplished. On the present occasion, my Lords, the people have demonstrated their loyalty

* In the illustrious roll of martyrs to the cause of liberty, no name stands more conspicuously distinguished, or is written in fairer characters, than that of Lord RUSSEL, whose patriotism appears unsullied with any base alloy of personal resentment or interest. In reply to those sophistical reasons by which Burnet, afterwards Bishop of Sarum, attempted to draw from this Nobleman an inglorious acknowledgement of culpability in meditating resistance to tyranny, he made this excellent and memorable declaration—"That he could form no conception of a limited monarchy which had no right to defend its own limitations;" So long as sensibility and gratitude are numbered amongst the affections of the human heart, so long shall we honor with a supreme reverence those who have dared to die for their country; and, with an almost superstitious devotion,

"Kiss with joy the sacred earth

That gave a HAMPDEN or a RUSSEL birth,"

by

by innumerable addresses from all parts, drawn up in terms expressive of the firmest fidelity and the warmest affection—professions which surely deserve far other return than the severity of a penal law, by which one person is condemned to suffer for the crime of another. If it be necessary, my Lords, that subjects should obey their governors, it is no less necessary that governors should not harass their subjects by causeless suspicion; for this will certainly tend to weaken their affections—it may incite them to violate their duties. The multiplicity of penal laws, the establishment of armies, the distribution of pensions, are transitory and uncertain supports of government, which the first blast of discontent may drive before it, and which have a tendency to produce that rage which they cannot furnish the means of resisting. Ten thousand penal laws cannot so much contribute to the establishment of the present royal family as one act of confidence, condescension, or bounty, by which the affections of the people may be conciliated. We are not, my Lords, to appease the suspicions of the throne by sacrificing the safety or happiness of the people: We are, indeed, to support our Sovereign, but not by such means as to destroy the ends for which sovereignty was established—the public welfare and common security. How, then, can we assent to a measure which may involve thousands in undeserved misery, by punishing them for crimes which they

they did not commit, and which it was not in their power to prevent — and inflicting penalties in order to enrich by forfeitures the minions of a court? But exclusive of these considerations, and to advert to an objection of a different nature, what evidence exists by which it can be ascertained that there never will come a time, in which a superstitious, ambitious, or tyrannical Prince may once more attempt the subversion of the rights and liberties of the kingdom? If, then, a time so fatal shall ever arrive, and another revolution be necessary, how must a law like this damp the ardor of that patriotism by which all revolutions have been accomplished? Who will be found hardy enough to oppose the Crown, when not only himself but his whole posterity are involved in the danger and ruin of a failure? We are to reflect, that the King may not only be in danger from his people, but that the people may be in danger from their King; and as, on the one hand, no privilege should be conferred tending to the encouragement of popular sedition; on the other, no prerogative ought to be endured which may incite to acts of royal oppression. The dependence of the monarch and the subject ought to be on reciprocal affection and mutual assistance; and, if I am desirous of securing the throne, it is not by disarming the people, but by placing them as guards before it." The clause in question was also vigorously and eloquently opposed posed by the Lords Talbot, Chesterfield, and others—and defended by the Lords Carteret and Hardwick, and Secker, Bishop of Oxford, though a measure flagrantly incompatible with the mild and benevolent spirit of Christianity. The question being put, it passed in the affirmative; but it was accompanied with a strong and animated protest.

The bill, when returned to the Commons with this new and unexpected clause, occasioned great dissatisfaction and opposition. Mr. Fazakerley, the original mover of the bill, expressed, in warm and indignant language, his detestation of the clause added by the Lords. “Forfeitures and confiscations, he said, he had always regarded as unjust, cruel, and of dangerous consequence to the liberties of a free people. As to the authority of Grotius and Puffendorf—which had been adduced in the course of an elaborate speech in defence of the amendment by the Attorney General, Sir Dudley Ryder—he said, they wrote in countries where forfeitures for treason had been established for ages, at a period far less enlightened than the present, when it would have been not only unusual but dangerous absolutely and explicitly to have condemned them, and an indirect disapprobation is easily discernible. At any rate, we are not blindly to resign our judgments either to the learned Grotius, or the learned Puffendorf. Still less satisfactory was the appeal made to the divine than to human authority in vindication of this law. It is certain that we find no such punishment inflicted by the law of Moses: And if David seized, as the learned Gentleman has affirmed to the House, upon the estate of Saul, this was certainly the commission, and not the penalty, of treason. As to the case of Mephibosheth, he was not so much as accused of treason, but of ingratitude; and the punishment inflicted upon him was the mere act of arbitrary power. But admitting that the Kings of the Jews acted upon the principle of this iniquitous law, their example can be no authority; for Samuel had before warned the Jews of the oppressions they were to expect from Kings: He had told them that the King would take their fields, their vineyards, and their olive-trees, and give the best of them to his servants. The charge of treason was no doubt made use of to furnish a pretext for these enormous injuries; and the experience of our own government may convince us what tyranny might be exercised under a veil so specious. It will be alleged, perhaps, that this law, however inconsistent with humanity and justice, is necessary to the preservation of the government: But is this the fact in the eastern countries, where punishments still more horrid and barbarous are inflicted in cases of this nature? These unjust and odious penalties only serve to lull a government into a fatal security, and to embolden arbitrary Ministers to tyrannize over the people, till, inflamed by repeated acts of oppression, the train is set fire to, and the Ministers, with their master, are blown up by the combustibles which they had so assiduously prepared for the destruction of others." The House, however, agreed to the amendment, by a majority of eighty voices; and a new proof was exhibited to the world of how little estimation, in the view of Princes, are all considerations of moral and political justice, when deemed incompatible with their interest or security.
in

the

This year, 1743, the Swedes terminated an unsuccessful war with Russia, by a peace signed at Abo, by which they were totally detached from their political connection with France. This event, so intimately affecting the general state of politics in Europe, requires a distinct elucidation. At the death of the last Monarch of Sweden, the celebrated Charles XII. (A. D. 1718), who had governed with a sway the most arbitrary and imperious, and whose rash and romantic enterprises had reduced his country to the verge of ruin, Sweden found itself in a situation the most favorable for finally abolishing despotism, and establishing a free and equal government on a solid and permanent basis. A Diet being immediately convoked, the throne of Sweden was declared VACANT—Charles having died without issue, and the claim of his sisters to the succession being barred, conformably to a fundamental law of the kingdom, by their previous marriage. The States, therefore, determined to make an offer of the crown to Ulrica Eleonora, consort of Frederic, hereditary Prince of Hesse Cassel, subsequently associated in the government, to the exclusion of the Duke of Holstein, son of the elder sister, on the express condition that this Princess should declare her readiness to hold the crown in virtue of a FREE ELECTION, and should take an oath to adhere to the new formula or model of government, now, by the authority of the nation, solemnly instituted—"the Counsellors and States of the kingdom assembled, having, as they express themselves, experienced the sad consequences of that arbitrary power which has so much weakened and injured the kingdom, to the almost irreparable ruin of us all, have seriously and unanimously resolved to abolish entirely a power which has proved so prejudicial." It is to be remarked, that the Diet, or States General of the kingdom of Sweden, consists of four distinct chambers or houses—the Nobles, the Clergy, the Burghers, the Peasants. These, agreeably to the constitution now established, were to be convoked every three years, or more frequently, if occasion required. And should the King, or Senate in his absence, neglect to assemble them at the expiration of this term, or even should they not convoke them on the very day the States had, the last time they were were assembled, chosen to appoint for their next meeting, these should then have a right to assemble of themselves. And whatever the King or Senate should have done in the mean time, was to be considered as void. The time specified for the shortest legal duration of the Diet was three months; but the power of dissolution was vested in themselves alone. While the States were assembled, they were in fact possessed of the whole supreme power; the authority of the King and Senate was then suspended—they became mere cyphers, having little or no share in the public transactions but what consisted simply in affixing their seals and signatures to whatever the Diet should think proper to resolve. The legislative power the States reserved at all times wholly to themselves, the King and the Senate not even possessing a negative on those resolutions which directly attacked the regal and senatorial rights. “For the preservation of these, it is remarked with just derision*, they were to depend on the MODERATION OF A POPULAR ASSEMBLY.” The following powers were likewise vested in the States alone: Those of declaring war or making peace—that of altering the standard of the coin—whenever a vacancy happened in the Senate, that of presenting to the King three persons, one of whom his Majesty was bound to make choice of to fill the vacant office—lastly, that of dismissing any member of the Senate whose conduct they disapproved. During the session of the Diet, a standing secret committee was chosen, selected from the three orders of Nobles, Clergy, and Burghers, of which one half were Nobles—the order of peasants being too mean and insignificant to be associated in this commission—by which the ordinary functions of the Senate were almost entirely superseded, and the executive powers of the government exclusively exercised. With regard to the judicial power, the States assumed to themselves a right of exercising that also, whenever they thought proper, by taking at pleasure causes out of the high courts of justice established by law, to try them before a temporary tribunal erected by themselves, and composed of their own members. Nothing, therefore, could be more formidable than the power of this assembly, or more subversive of liberty; as, in reality, it united within itself the legislative, judicial, and executive powers—and as the province and jurisdiction of the occasional tribunal comprehended all cases of treason, sedition, and public libel, it was evidently, at the same time, both judge and party. Even during the intervals of the Diets, the King was little more than a cypher of state, and was distinguished from the other Senators, consisting of fourteen in number, only by the privilege of a double voice in the first instance, and

to

* Vide History of the Swedish Revolution, A. D. 1772, by Charles F. Sheridan, Esq.

and of a casting vote in case of an equality of voices. The Senate were empowered to assemble themselves whenever they thought proper, and to transact the national business whether the King were present or not; and to their resolutions his Majesty was obliged to affix his signature. The great employments of the State were conferred by a majority of voices in the Senate; and, to others of inferior importance, three persons were nominated by the Senate, one of whom the King was obliged to appoint. Thus the outward pomp and decorations of Majesty were almost all that remained of a prerogative lately so formidable: But a more recent experience soon taught the Swedes that political oppression might exist under a variety of forms, and that the liberty of the people was not necessarily increased in proportion as the power of the Monarch was diminished; and the scenes of corruption, distraction, and anarchy, which ensued, were the most decisive proofs of the numerous and radical defects of the new formula of government. When compared with the British constitution, the prodigious superiority of the latter is manifest in almost every point of view in which they can be placed—their whole structure, genius, and spirit, forming a most instructive and striking contrast. In England, the Crown is vested by the constitution with the whole active power of government, subject to the authoritative inspection and control of Parliament; and it is also possessed, by means of its extensive patronage, of that degree of influence over the legislative body which must not only preclude the idea of foreign intrigue and interference, but of that species of opposition which arises from the natural and incessant desire of aggrandizement; the interests of the individual members being opposed to the aggregate interest of the body—the negative of the King and the power of dissolution coming likewise in aid of that prerogative which is at once so open to the attack, and so unequal to the encounter. On the other hand, the constitutional powers of Parliament, and its component principles, are such as eminently to qualify it for its province of legislation and control. The House of Commons is invested with the sole disposal of the national revenue, which, of itself, gives it a decided preponderance over the other, and, with respect to rank, the higher branch of the legislature. The Commons of England are not, like the Commons of Sweden, divided into distinct chambers, by which their collective force is sensibly enfeebled. The English House of Commons likewise contains a much greater combination of interests than, in consequence of the absurd restraints on the freedom of election, can take place in Sweden; where the burghers and peasants must be actually of the several classes of the community which they represent. Also, in Sweden all the privileges of the Nobility, that that of sitting in the Diet excepted, extending to all the descendants of Nobles, a vast proportion of the landed property of the kingdom, and almost all the military and civil offices, are confined to that privileged class; the aristocratic branch of the legislature, supported by this immense chain of connections and dependencies, rising far above all competition: Whereas, in England, the descendants of the Nobility, the heirs of the title only excepted, are immediately blended with the general mass of the community, and their political interests stand consequently in unavoidable and direct opposition to those of their nearest relatives, as composing a distinct and privileged order. Thus the Nobles of England are placed in that precise rank which properly belongs to the most illustrious order of citizens in a free and well-governed community. Invested with the highest dignity, though not the highest power, of the State, they compose an hereditary Senate, peculiarly qualified, from that dissimilarity of views and interests by which, as a distinct branch of the legislature, they must be necessarily actuated, for the province of revision, and resistance to ambitious or insidious innovation—standing as a perpetual barrier against all attempts to encroach upon the constitutional prerogative of the Crown, upon which they depend as the firmest basis of their own authority. For the weight of the democracy in the English constitution is such, as to preclude the aristocracy from the faintest hope of success in any contest for pre-eminence which might succeed the eventual reduction or annihilation of the regal power. It cannot certainly be pretended, that the progressive improvement of former ages, or even the important and beneficial changes which took place at the Revolution, were the result of any comprehensive abstract speculation; they were such as the emergency of the occasion rendered obvious and necessary; and we speak of the wisdom of the constitution, not with a reference to the speculative sagacity of individuals, but to the practical advantages and firm contexture of a form of government finished, undoubtedly, more through happiness than pains. It is true, indeed, that, through the gross inequality of the present system of representation, destined doubtless, if Liberty survive, to undergo a radical reform, a degree of influence is exerted by the executive power over the legislative, inconsistent with the true spirit of the constitution, and productive of the most injurious effects. Under such a government as that established in Sweden, it can excite no astonishment that the intrigues of foreign courts should very powerfully and sensibly operate. In fact, from the æra of that establishment, all the apparently weak and capricious transactions of this kingdom were guided solely by the predominance of the different political factions, the violent and malignant conflicts conflicts of which were excited and perpetuated by the most shameless corruption, universally practised, and almost openly avowed. The whole power of the State virtually resting in the hands of the Nobles, no advance was made, or design entertained, to extend to the nation at large the blessings of civil liberty. And the people feeling themselves in no degree relieved from the oppression of the ancient government, notwithstanding the system of political liberty recently established—of the excellence of which they heard indeed much, but comprehended little—were loud in their complaints of the misconduct and tyranny of their rulers. The fixed policy of the leading men originally concerned in framing the new form of government *, who were persons of virtue and probity, and, in all probability, far from being sensible of its imperfections, was, to renounce all ambition of foreign conquests, and assiduously to cultivate the friendship of Russia, the superiority of whose power they had so fatally experienced. And the influence of Russia continued, with little interruption, to predominate in their councils till the meeting of the Diet in 1738, when, through the profusion of French gold previously distributed amongst its members, a great majority appeared determined to abandon the alliance of Russia, and to enter into a strict connection with the Court of Versailles; which flattered them with the chimerical hope of recovering, by a rupture with the Court of St. Petersburg, their long-lost provinces. And, at the instance of the French Minister, war was actually declared by Sweden against Russia, without any just reasons, or even plausible pretences; the real motive on the part of France being, as the Queen of Hungary observed in her manifesto, to prevent the Czarina from interposing in the affairs of the Empire. This unjust and impolitic war was undertaken by Sweden at a time when the armies of Russia were returning triumphant from the Turkish campaigns; and the success was such as might be reasonably expected. The Swedish army in Finland was destroyed, and the whole of that country lost. The Generals Lewenhaupt and Buddenbroek were sacrificed to the fury of a faction. The government of Sweden, alarmed at the rapid progress of the Russians, were compelled to solicit a peace, which was granted upon very moderate terms, Russia restoring the whole of her conquests, a small district to the eastward of the Kymen only excepted. And, in return, the Swedes renewed their alliance with Russia, and agreed to appoint Adolphus Frederic, Bishop of Lubec, a Prince of the House of Holstein, nearly related to the Empress Elizabeth, successor to the present King; the young Duke of Holstein, grandson of the elder sister

* Count Horne is said to have been the person principally concerned in the establishment of this constitution—a Nobleman of unquestionable abilities and integrity.

sister of Ulrica, being destined to the succession of Russia, as nephew to the Empress, on his previous and formal renunciation of all claim to the Crown of Sweden. In allusion to this transaction, as likewise to the late disposition of the Crown of Poland, the Imperial Ambassador at Petersburg observed to the Empress, "that he wished his Court had found it as easy to keep possession of kingdoms as it was to Russia to give them away."

Though France had thus, by the perfidy of her own policy, lost one useful ally, she made vigorous efforts to indemnify herself by the acquisition of another—the contiguous kingdom of Denmark. From the memorable æra in which the Danes made a voluntary surrender of their ancient liberties to the Monarch, the Kings of Denmark had been possessed of authority not inferior to that of any Sovereigns in Christendom; and the want of ability, rather than of inclination, had since prevented them from making a more conspicuous figure in the general history of Europe; as they never appeared reluctant or scrupulous in embracing any favorable opportunity of aggrandizement. Christiern V. who acceded to the throne A. D. 1670, waged unsuccessful war with the Swedes, in the vain hope of recovering the beautiful provinces of Halland, Schonen, and Bleking, lost by his father Frederic III. and ceded to Sweden by the treaty of Roschild, 1658. Christiern dying in 1699, was suc-

succeeded by his son Frederic IV. who joined the confederacy against Charles XII. was besieged by that Monarch in his capital, and compelled to submit to the terms dictated by Sweden, under the mediation of England and Holland, at the treaty of Travendahl. After the decline of that Monarch's fortunes, Frederic renewed the war, and seized upon the Dutchies of Bremen, Verden, and Sleswic, the latter of which was guaranteed to Denmark by King George I. in return for the cession of the two former to Hanover. This Monarch dying A. D. 1730, was succeeded by Christiern VI. a sagacious and pacific Prince, who aspired, nevertheless, when the succession to the throne of Sweden was vacant, to revive the ancient and celebrated union of Calmar; and to combine by an indissoluble federation, the three Scandinavian kingdoms into one empire, under one head, in the person of his son. Flattered with the aid and assistance of France in the accomplishment of this great object of his ambition, he relinquished, at this period, the alliance, and refused the subsidies, of Great Britain, in order to connect himself with that rival power. But notwithstanding that the idea of this union was very popular in Sweden, and was supported by a very strong party in the Diet, the opposing politics of Russia proved finally successful; and the King of Denmark had the good sense to desist from the farther prosecution of a project which it was become too hazardous to attempt to enforce, although great

great military preparations had been made for that purpose. But the Czarina declared, that, if the Swedes were attacked, she would assist them with the whole force of her empire. The good understanding between Denmark and Great Britain was, immediately on the relinquishment of this visionary scheme, restored and cemented by the marriage of Frederic, Prince Royal of Denmark, with Louisa, youngest daughter of his Britannic Majesty, which took place towards the conclusion of the present year. The King of Denmark survived this alliance, which was productive of general satisfaction to the inhabitants of both kingdoms, little more than two years. The Princess Mary, third daughter to the King of England, had, at a period somewhat anterior to the events now related, been married to Frederic, Prince of Hesse Cassel, nephew to the King of Sweden, and presumptive heir to the Landgraviate.

At this time, Admiral Matthews commanded with high reputation the British naval force in the Mediterranean. The Corsicans having revolted from the dominion of Genoa, and elected a German adventurer as their Sovereign, by the name of King Theodore, were supported and encouraged by this Commander, in revenge for the partiality shewn by the Genoese to the French and Spanish arms in Italy; though these brave islanders were, in the sequel, forgotten and abandoned to their fate. Stores having been landed at Civita Vecchia for

for the use of the Spanish army under the Count de Gages, the British Admiral declared it to be a violation of the neutrality professed by his Holiness the Pope, and threatened a bombardment of that city; but desisted in consequence of the interposition of his Sardinian Majesty. The commerce of France and Spain was interrupted, many prizes made, their coasts kept in continual alarm, and the combined squadrons of the two powers were blocked up for several successive months in the harbor of Toulon. On the ninth of February 1744, they were at last perceived standing out of the road, to the number of four and thirty sail of the line. The British Admiral immediately weighed, and an engagement ensued, which, notwithstanding the great superiority of the British fleet, proved extremely indecisive; and which was afterwards the subject of much and vehement debate and discussion. It is admitted that Matthews behaved with heroic gallantry; but he was very ill seconded by some of his officers, particularly by Admiral Lestock, who, with his whole division, remained at a great distance astern. It is not pretended that this officer was really deficient in courage, but he had long been upon very ill terms with his Commander, whom he affected to despise, and whose signals on the day of battle he affirmed to be unintelligible and inconsistent—sheltering himself behind those rigid rules of discipline, against which, in the crisis of danger, it is often the highest merit gloriously gloriously to offend. Admiral Matthews, on his arrival at Minorca, suspended Lestock for disobedience, and sent him as a prisoner to England, where he, in return, accused, and recriminated upon his superior. These proceedings became the subject of parliamentary investigation; and a court-martial was appointed to try the delinquents. It appears that the object of De Court, the French Commander, whose ships greatly outailed those of the British squadron, being to avoid an engagement, the English Commander was compelled to commence the attack before the line was completely formed: And he directed his principal effort against the Spanish division, which sailing in the rear of the French, and at some distance, he endeavored to cut off—being himself, in the Namur, closely engaged with the Spanish Admiral Don Navarro, in the Royal Philip, an immense ship of one hundred and fourteen guns. Admiral Lestock was, at this time, five miles astern, suffering, by an obstinate adherence to the signal for the line of battle, then flying at the same time with the signal for a close engagement, the rearmost ships of the Spanish squadron to pass him: On which Admiral Matthews, though bravely seconded by Captain Cornewall, in the Marlborough, who gloriously fell in the action, and other ships of his own division, was obliged to relinquish his prey at a moment when he flattered himself that she could not have escaped him, being, as he affirms in his public letter, "within musket shot of the Royal Philip, then lying a mere wreck, when the sternmost ships of the enemy came up and tore him to pieces." In the result, Admiral Lestock, to the general surprise and indignation, was honorably acquitted, and Admiral Matthews declared incapable of serving for the future in his Majesty's navy. The King himself, who was personally brave, and a lover of the brave, is said to have expressed, in warm terms, his disapprobation of this decision. And, when an elaborate technical vindication of the sentence of the court-martial was offered, he indignantly replied, "that he knew but little of naval phraseology; but this, said his Majesty, I know, that Matthews did fight, and that Lestock did not."

In July, Sir John Balchen, an officer of great merit, sailed from Spithead with a strong squadron, in quest of a French fleet expected to depart about this time from the harbor of Brest. In the Bay of Biscay he encountered a violent storm, by which the fleet was entirely scattered, and the Admiral's own ship, the Victory, a new and beautiful first-rate, with eleven hundred men on board, foundered at sea, near the rocks of Alderney; and the whole crew, with all the officers and their commander, most unfortunately perished.

Another revolution about this period (November 1744) took place in the British cabinet. Lord Carteret, teret, now become Earl of Granville, had insinuated himself so far into the good graces of his Sovereign as to excite, in a very high degree, the apprehension and dislike of the Duke of Newcastle and his brother, Mr. Pelham, who secretly intrigued with the popular leaders in Parliament, to effect the downfall of this ambitious and haughty Minister, whose power they envied, and whose talents they feared. The Earl, comprehending the nature and extent of the combination against him, and sensible of his own unpopularity, heightened by the ill success of the war, avoided the conflict by a voluntary resignation of his employments, in which he was followed by Mr. Sandys, created Lord Sandys, and various others. Mr. Pelham, who, on the death of Lord Wilmington, had succeeded to the direction of the Board of Treasury, was now nominated Chancellor of the Exchequer, and may be considered from this period as first Minister. The Earl of Chesterfield was appointed to the government of Ireland, the Duke of Bedford placed at the head of the Admiralty, the Lords Gower and Cobham reinstated in their former posts, and, after an interval of delay and reluctance on the part of the Court, Mr. Pitt constituted Paymaster of the Forces, and sworn a member of the Privy Council. Several of the Tories were admitted to offices in consequence of this coalition of parties; and Sir John Hynde Cotton and Sir John Phelips, those more:

morose and turbulent patriots, were—for a time of short duration indeed, “a little month”—transformed into courtiers and placemen. The Parliament met in December (1744), and it soon appeared that the result of the late changes was by no means unfavorable to the views of the Court; for the same system was pursued with less difficulty and interruption: And the patriots still in opposition, wearied with long and useless exertion, seemed at length to acquiesce in measures which the nation at large, now roused into passionate resentment against France, and admiration of the courage and fortitude of the Queen of Hungary, began to regard with partiality and approbation. And the unre-mitted efforts of thirty years, efforts which had produced such signal displays of knowledge, virtue, and eloquence, ingloriously terminated in the ancient maxim—“Si populus vult decipi, decipiatur.” As the last struggle of expiring patriotism, however, the House was moved, January 1745, that an act made in the fourth year of Edward III. entitled—“A Parliament shall be holden once every year,” and also that an act made in the thirty-sixth year of the reign of King Edward III. entitled—“A Parliament shall be holden once every year,” shall be read; and the acts being read accordingly, Mr. Carew* arose, and declared his determination

to

* This member, in a subsequent Session of the present Parliament, moved an address to the King, that he would be pleased to bring to a DECISIVE TEST the sincerity of those professions which the Ministers of the Crown recently appointed to their offices had, for so many successive years, accustomed themselves to repeat within the walls of that House; and, from the fate of the question he was about to propose, a judgment might be formed whether the present Ministers themselves to order a monument to be erected in Westminster Abbey to the memory of the gallant Captain Cornewall, who lost his life in the engagement off Toulon; which being unanimously carried, Velters Cornewall, brother to the deceased, rose "to express the pride and satisfaction he felt on this occasion; more particularly as the motion originated with one of the most able, upright, and disinterested patriots who had ever sat in that House." We may, therefore, fairly presume, that the speech of Mr. Carew does not contain words of empty sound, intended for the mere purpose of embarrassing the administration, but that it exhibits the real sentiments of his understanding, and the genuine feelings of his heart. And it may be remarked, that the value and utility of exertions of this nature, are not to be estimated by the advantage they immediately produce. Mr. Carew and Mr. Sydenham yet speak in history; nor will it ultimately be found that such men speak in vain. In our own times, the orations of Mr. Fox in support of his several motions for the repeal of the test and penal statutes, were negatived by great majorities; but are these generous efforts in the cause of truth and liberty therefore lost? No—doubtless they will produce their effect at the destined period on minds more susceptible of improvement, and less under the dominion of prejudice—

to

"When Statesmen, Heroes, Kings, in dust repose, Whose sons shall blush their fathers were his foes."

merited

merited those severe appellations which they had so lavishly bestowed upon their predecessors. It was not enough, he said, for the satisfaction of the impartial and intelligent public, that the new Ministers should give a simple assent to the motion he had in contemplation; for, if they had coalesced with persons whose influence was, upon trial, found sufficiently powerful to defeat all efforts of political reform, it was incumbent upon them immediately to relinquish those offices which they had so precipitately accepted, without any stipulations in favor of the public; and unreservedly to declare against those with whom they had so rashly united. Amongst the topics most frequently insisted upon by the present Ministers, when in opposition to the Court, was the necessity of counteracting the baleful effects of ministerial corruption, which they then seemed to think, and he hoped they still thought, could by no means so effectually be done as by a restoration of the ancient constitution of Parliament, agreeably to which, the House would perceive, by the acts now read, that Parliaments were to be holden once every year. And as long prorogations and adjournments were not then introduced or thought of, the meaning of this famous law must be, that a Parliament should be every year chosen as well as held. And this is a constitution not only sanctioned by ancient practice, but by the unalterable dictates of reason. In order that the representatives of a great nation may be perfectly acquainted with the state of its wishes, wants, and grievances, it is necessary that there should be an intimate and habitual communication between them and their constituents. But, when Gentlemen are chosen for a term of years, they too frequently, on their election, appear at once to relinquish the character and feelings of delegates; they fix their abode in the metropolis, and visit their constituents only when it becomes necessary to solicit their votes at the eve of a new election. Nay, such was the degraded and corrupt state into which the national representation had fallen since the establishment of Septennial Parliaments, that there were Gentlemen in that House who never saw the borough which sent them thither; who, perhaps, would be at a loss even to recollect its name; and who were obliged to have recourse to the Court Calendar to inform them of whom they were the representatives. It was the peculiar and proper province of the House of Commons, he said, to convey to the Sovereign the sentiments of the nation, both with respect to the measures he adopts, and the Ministers he employs. But could this duty be justly or faithfully executed, when there is no proper intercourse established between those who represent and those who are represented? The interests of the Prince and the People cannot really and truly differ; he can only be great in their greatness, and prosperous in their prosperity. But the general interest of the People, and the personal interest of the Ministers, may very essentially differ; they may have no other ends in view than to impoverish and enslave the people, in order to enrich and aggrandize themselves: And, during a long term of delegation, how easy will it ever be for artful and designing men to misrepresent the sentiments of the People to the Sovereign, and to pervert, by sinister and corrupt practices, the integrity of those persons whose duty it is, and who are expressly appointed, to guard the liberties, and protect the rights of the community? Properly speaking, Mr. Carew said, the House of Commons were no more than the attornies of the People: And is it reasonable that any man should be entrusted with a power of attorney irrevocable for a long term of years? Shall a whole People do that which would be the height of foolishness in every individual? Who can depend upon the continuance of any man's integrity? But the Septennial Bill was passed for the purpose of compelling the People to give an irrevocable power of attorney for that term. The practice of long Parliaments was first introduced in the reign of Richard II. when the interests of the country were sacrificed by wicked Ministers, to gratify the violent passions of the Monarch. But what was the result? The discontents and murmurs of the People, so carefully concealed from the knowledge of the King, at last produced an universal ful convulsion, which terminated in his ruin, and in the advancement of the Duke of Lancaster to the throne, without any other title than that of having rescued the People from slavery. This was the fate of the Prince who first introduced long Parliaments; but so long as a corrupt majority may be more easily obtained in a long than a short Parliament, so long will it be the interest of Ministers to oppose any limitation of the duration of Parliaments, though the interests both of the Monarch and the People ever so manifestly require it. If Septennial Parliaments be continued in this country, the Minister's letters of recommendation may, in time, be as implicitly obeyed in our counties, cities, and boroughs, as the King's congé d'elire is now in the chapters of our episcopal cathedrals. But will any one assert, that we should then have the slightest pretence to the character of a free nation? No—we should be slaves; God knows to whom—not, it may be hoped, to a Minister from HANOVER; though it is hard to say what a corrupt Parliament may not attempt, or to what a corrupt nation may not submit. To prevent, however, as far as my exertions can contribute to the prevention of such a catastrophe, I shall conclude with moving for leave to bring in a bill to enforce the calling of a new Parliament every year after the expiration of this present Parliament."
repre-

sal

This motion was very ably seconded by Mr. Sydenham, in an interesting speech, of which the concise epitome only must suffice. This Gentleman began by observing, " that he must take it for granted that every member of that House must be conscious of the necessity of adopting measures of some kind for preventing, or, at least, diminishing the extent and effect of ministerial corruption. And, of all the measures that could be devised, none would be found so effectual as the restoration of annual Parliaments. To the fatal introduction of long Parliaments, and their concomitant evils, he ascribed, in a great measure, that remarkable change in the manners and morals of the people at large, which had of late years taken place in this country. Formerly, the higher classes among us were distinguished for generosity and hospitality, and those of inferior rank for honesty, frugality, and industry. But these virtues are in danger of being utterly extinguished by the prevalence of political corruption. No sooner did Ministers begin to solicit the votes, instead of convincing the understandings of the Members of Parliament—no sooner were rewards lavished on those who complied with those solicitations, than the public order was disturbed by violent competitions at elections. Voters began to claim a merit with those to whom they gave their vote: The regular channel through which honors and preferments flowed was perverted, verted, and the interest of the country was sacrificed for the sake of promoting those who had the chief interests in elections. Even in our army and navy, of late years, this has appeared to be the best qualification for entitling a man to preferment. We must, therefore, demolish from the foundation this fabric of corruption; we must render it impossible for a Minister to expect to gain a majority in Parliament, or at elections, either by bribery, or by a partial distribution of places and preferments. I say, we must do this, if we intend to restore that spirit by which our ancestors preserved their liberties, and gained so much glory to their country. And, for this purpose, nothing can be so effectual as the restoration of annual Parliaments. Then may we hope to see that simplicity, generosity, and hospitality of manners revived, which is now no more. For I hope it will not be called generosity to give a voter, by express bargain, five or ten guineas for his vote; or hospitality, to make a county or a borough drunk once in seven years, by way of preparation for an ensuing election. When a Gentleman perceives that the favor of his countrymen must be purchased, not won, he contracts his domestic to provide for his election expenses; and, if he succeeds, he retires with his family to London, certain of his seat for seven years, and resolving so to regulate his conduct in Parliament as may secure his future indemnification.

nification. This change of a country life into a town life has been attended with unspeakable inconveniencies. A man of fortune who resides in London may, in operas, routes, assemblies, French wines, and Italian musicians, expend as much yearly as may suffice to maintain his rank in the most hospitable style of ancient liberality at his seat in the country. But will it be pretended, that the money so expended is of equal advantage to the community? that the same charity is extended to the indigent, the same employment to the industrious? Annual Parliaments would undoubtedly produce a mighty alteration of national manners in this respect. They would make constant residence and a constant inter-communication of kind offices necessary; they would preserve the honesty of our people, by removing the means of temptation; for no candidate would then be at the expense of corrupting, especially as he could not expect to be repaid, by being himself corrupted by the Minister after he is chosen. Annual Parliaments will demolish the market of corruption. Ministers will not corrupt when corruption can be of no avail; and, though contests may occasionally take place, the magnitude of the object will not be such as to occasion either venality or violence. If, therefore, we cherish a laudable ambition to restore the practice of those virtues for which our ancestors were so conspicuous, and by which they handed down to us riches, renown, and liberty, we must restore the constitution of having Parliaments not only annually held, but annually chosen. It was a regulation restored and established by one of the greatest and wisest Princes that ever swayed the sceptre of this kingdom. The bill passed in the fourth year of the reign of this Monarch (Edward III.) was indeed evaded by the ingenuity of the lawyers. The words of the act were these—"A Parliament shall be holden once a-year, and oftener if need be." The lawyers maintained that the words "if need be" related to the first part of the law as well as the second; i. e. that a Parliament shall be held once a-year if need be, or oftener if need be; a construction which rendered the act itself wholly nugatory. In the thirty-sixth year of the reign of the same Monarch, therefore, a new law was passed, by which it was enacted, without any reserve or limitation, "that a Parliament shall be holden every year." This set the invention of the lawyers again at work, in order to find a new evasion; and, in the next reign, the practice of prorogation was introduced. Every session of Parliament was declared to be a Parliament, and the liberties of the nation were sacrificed by a Parliament corruptly chosen and illegally continued. Should this now be attempted, it would be found very difficult, if not impossible, to rescue them by force of arms, as was done in the reign of Richard II.; for the crown has now a regular disciplined army to support its encroachments, and the People have neither arms nor discipline to oppose to such a King and such a Parliament. This consideration alone would make me sanguine in the support of the measure now proposed; and for this reason, among many others, I conclude with seconding the motion.* The speeches of these able and virtuous senators have been thus distinctly recited, because they discover just and noble sentiments of government, and disclose a glorious prospect of political reformation, which it is left to a happier and more enlightened age to realize*. The motion was feebly opposed in a diffusive and labored speech by Sir William Yonge, Secretary at War, by arguments which, if they proved any thing, would prove that Parliaments ought to be perpetual. But the principal Ministers of the Crown observed a profound silence, not being able to endure the test of this experimentum crucis. It is, however, extremely remarkable, that, on the division, the question was negatived by a majority of thirty-two voices only, in a house of two hundred and sixty-three members. No attempt at parliamentary reform, in any shape,

* In the writings of SWIFT, a man naturally of a sound and excellent judgment, though unhappily too much under the dominion of violent and malignant passions, is somewhere to be found this remarkable acknowledgement: "I adore the wisdom of that Gothic constitution which made Parliaments annual."

after

after this, was made for thirteen years, when a motion for shortening the duration of Parliaments was negatived almost without the formality of a debate. Very recently, indeed, the question has been revived with great lustre and advantage under the auspices of men of the highest talents, and bids fair to excite the serious and continued attention of the public, especially as it is at last combined, as it ever ought to have been, with the kindred question of an equalization of the representation *. So long as this grand reform of Parliament itself remains unaccomplished, no essential reform in other respects is to be expected.

Previous to the departure of the Earl of Chesterfield for the government of Ireland, he was invested with the character of Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the States General, in order to prevail upon their High Mightinesses to take a more active and decisive part in that war, which it could not fail to be remarked that his Lordship had repeatedly inveighed against in Parliament as romantic, absurd, and contrary to the interests of both

* It will easily be supposed, that an allusion is here intended to the Association lately instituted in the metropolis, for obtaining a reform in Parliament; which, exclusive of the avowed approbation of the great rival-statesmen, Mr. PITT and Mr. FOX, respecting its object, boasts the distinguished names of GREY, FRANCIS, LAMBTON, WHITBREAD, ERSKINE, SMITH, and many others, which would reflect honor on any cause; and this is certainly a cause which would reflect honor upon any names.

both countries. Nevertheless, as the nation had determined upon war, his Lordship might deem it no violation of moral or political obligation to exert his utmost efforts, as a public man, to render it successful; and it is certain, that he never ceased to use his influence in the cabinet to accomplish the restoration of peace; and, in consequence of his disappointment and dissatisfaction in not being able to attain that favorite object of his wishes, he resigned the Seals of Secretary of State, which were configned to him after his return from Ireland. "Every thing, says the Earl, speaking confidentially of the state of affairs at this period, which does not tend to a peace is absurd, and will, in the end, prove fatal." And it is but impartial justice to declare, that no man entertained more just or comprehensive ideas respecting the national interest and happiness than this Nobleman, and that few, if any, of his cotemporaries, can be named, who pursued them more resolutely and steadily. Incessantly urged and incited by the whole power and influence of the Orange faction, the States at length acceded to the substance of the Ambassador's proposals, and engaged to maintain an army of fifty thousand men in the field, exclusive of garrisons. But torn by intestine division and animosity, the terms of the treaty were, after the conclusion of it, little attended to; and, though the proportion of expense to be borne by Holland was mitigated from two-fifths to one-third, the danger to which the republic was exposed was neither sufficiently urgent, nor obvious, to excite a spirit of national ardor or unanimity*.

In the speech made by the Ambassador in the assembly of the States, at his audience of leave, are to be found the following animated expressions: "The love of liberty, which first laid the foundation of this republic, and has since so often signified her, this so noble and generous love still unites your strength and your counsels to those of the King my master. Actuated by the same spirit, and pursuing the same end, the sole object of your endeavors is to restore and secure the public liberty and tranquillity. What design can be more laudable? What work more worthy of a just and magnanimous zeal? Pursue, High and Mighty Lords, that design with your wonted steadiness and wisdom: Continue those efforts without suffering yourselves to be discouraged, and may Heaven crown your undertakings with the success they so well deserve." Exclusive, however, of the influence of French

* When Metrodorus was sent by Mithridates to solicit the aid of the King of Armenia against the Romans, Tigranes said, "What would you, Metrodorus, advise me to do in this case?" To which Metrodorus replied, "As an Ambassador I should exhort you to it; but, as your Counsellor, I should advise you against it." Had Lord Chesterfield been asked the same question, doubtless he must, if equally ingenuous, have returned a similar answer.

political intrigue, the majority of confederate persons in the commonwealth could not but regard the neutrality offered by France as infinitely more eligible than the war urged by England; nor could it be reasonably doubted, if the restoration of the peace of Europe were the real object in view, that Holland, who could propose to herself no prospect or possibility of advantage by the continuance of hostilities, might act with much greater effect and dignity as a mediator than as a party.

On the return of the Earl of Chesterfield from this embassy, he repaired to his government; and, during his continuance in that high office, he executed the duties of it with a vigilance, attention, and fidelity, which gave the most perfect satisfaction to the Irish nation; and have deservedly endeared his memory to that generous and grateful people. The violent measures which were proposed to him at the breaking out of the rebellion, respecting the Roman Catholics, he rejected with indignation. On the contrary, he treated them with a mildness and moderation which engaged their affection and confidence. A profound tranquillity prevailed throughout the kingdom; and it was observed, that the pastoral letters of the Irish priests, their public discourses, and more private admonitions, were equally and invariably directed for the service of the government. In his Excellency's speech from the throne, at the opening of the session, October 1745, after expressing his ardent wishes to co-operate with Parliament in whatever might tend to establish or promote the true interest of the kingdom, he tells them, "that their own reflections will best suggest to them the advantages they have enjoyed under the just and legal authority of the present race of Princes; and their own history will best paint the miseries and calamities of a people scourged, rather than governed, by blind zeal and lawless power; that these considerations must necessarily excite their highest indignation at the attempt now carrying on in Scotland, to disturb his Majesty's government by a pretender to his crown—one nursed up in civil and religious error, formed to persecution and oppression in the seat of superstition and tyranny; whose groundless claim is as contrary to the natural rights of mankind, as to the particular laws and constitutions of these kingdoms; whose only hopes of support are placed in the enemies of the liberties of Europe in general, and whose success would consequently destroy our liberty, our property, and our religion." So well assured was this Nobleman of the peaceable and loyal disposition of the nation at large, that he treated with pleasant ridicule the information brought to him by a Gentleman high in office, who, with marks of evident consternation, told his Excellency that the people in Connaught were certainly rising. The Earl, with perfect calmness calmness and composure, replied, "It is now nine o'clock, and time for them to rise; I therefore incline to believe your intelligence true."
the

This year, March 1745, died Robert, Earl of Orford, in circumstances by no means affluent, although he had for twenty years the revenues of Great Britain at his disposal. His death was occasioned by the violent operation of a medicine which he took as a solvent for the stone; and he declared that he died a victim to the neglect of his own maxim—not to disturb that which is at rest.

The naval operations of this summer were spirited and successful. A great number of rich prizes were captured from the enemy both in the East and West Indies. But the achievement by which it was chiefly distinguished was the conquest of the island of Cape Breton, in North America. This enterprize originated with the inhabitants of the province of New England; and the plan proposed by them being approved by the government, Admiral Warren, now commanding the British fleet in those seas, was commanded to co-operate with them. Six thousand colonial troops were embarked from Boston, which, with eight hundred marines from on board the fleet, constituted the whole of the land-force. But with such courage and vigor did these raw and undisciplined troops, under the conduct of the British engineers, carry on their approaches, and with such skill and judgment judgment were their operations seconded by the Admiral, that, in about eight weeks after the commencement of the siege, the fortress and city of Louisburg, and the whole island of Cape Breton, surrendered to the arms of his Britannic Majesty. The Americans, who were freed by this conquest from a dangerous neighbour, acquired great and deserved applause on the occasion. The rising importance of the Colonies became the subject of public attention and acknowledgement; and, by a generous excess of partiality, the magnitude of their services, and the beneficial consequences of this new conquest, were extolled and appreciated somewhat, perhaps, beyond their real and intrinsic value.

At the meeting of Parliament, January 1746, the King declared his regret at being obliged to have recourse to his people for farther aids; and, at the same time, his confidence in their zeal and unanimity in support of the public credit and safety. A new convulsion in the Ministry, however, retarded the progress of the supplies. A recent effort to introduce once more the Earl of Granville into the administration, had been made by the Sovereign, over whom that Nobleman had acquired a surprising ascendancy: But the Duke of Newcastle, and all who adhered to the widely-extended connection of the Pelhams, immediately on being acquainted with the King's determination, delivered delivered in their resignations. Lord Granville was, notwithstanding, actually appointed to the office of principal Secretary of State; but, relying on the greatness of his talents, he had ever disdained to court the support and assistance of friends; and, after a very short trial, he was compelled reluctantly once more to render back the Seals. The Pelhams again resumed their stations; and Lord Granville—relinquishing for ever the contest for superiority—was, after an interval of political obscurity, made President of the Council, which station he occupied many years, rather dignifying the office than dignified by it*. The supplies were now granted by the Commons with more than ordinary profusion. About one hundred and twenty thousand men, land forces, seamen, and marines, were provided for by Parliament. The sum of three hundred thousand pounds was voted to the King of Sardinia; four hundred thousand pounds

* February 10, 1746, the Duke of Newcastle and Lord Harrington resigned the Seals, and the Earl of Granville was appointed principal Secretary. The next day, Mr. Pelham resigned the Treasury, the Earl of Pembroke his gold key, and Mr. Legge and Mr. George Grenville their seats at the Board of Admiralty. The Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Bedford, first Lord of the Admiralty, the Earl of Chesterfield, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and almost all the other great Officers of State, were expected to follow, when on Friday, February 14, the Earl of Granville returned the Seals into his Majesty's hands, which were immediately re-delivered to the Duke of Newcastle.

to the Queen of Hungary, although that Princess had now fully surmounted her political embarrassments. Subsidies also were granted with an unsparing hand to the Dutch, the Hessians, the Saxons, the Hanoverians, the Electors of Mentz and Cologne; and the whole was crowned with a vote of credit and confidence for the sum of five hundred thousand pounds to his Majesty*. Notwithstanding this unheard-of prodigality of expen-

* It was boldly and shrewdly remarked by a political writer of these times, that, according to the historian Matthew Paris, when King Henry III. demanded money of his Parliament to defray the expense of a foreign expedition, which concerned not the interest of England, the Parliament told him flatly, that this was a most audacious requisition: "Talia effrons impudenter postulare. — Contradixerunt Regi in faciem, nolentes amplius pecunia sua spoliari." And upon his remonstrating, that his royal faith was pledged, and pleading the absolute necessity in which he stood of a supply, they expressed their astonishment that the immense sums of money already granted could be so soon dissipated: "Admiramur in quam abyssum submersæ sunt innumerabiles pecuniæ, quas, Domine Rex, immunxisti, quæ nunquam Regno vel modicum contulerunt incrementum," —M. Paris, p. 561, 26 Henry III.

It is said that Mr. Mitchel, the English Resident at Berlin, during the second Silesian war, in communicating to the King of Prussia the intelligence of some advantage obtained over the enemy, made use of the following expression—"By the help of God we have gained a victory over the French." "What, said the King, is God one of your allies?" "Yes certainly, Sire," replied the Ambassador, and the only one who demands no subsidies of us."

diture, no sensible effect was produced in the general system of affairs. An unsuccessful attempt was made in the course of this year, by Admiral Lestock and General St. Clair, on Port L'Orient, an opulent maritime town on the southern coast of Bretagne, and the grand depositary of the vessels and stores belonging to the French East India Company. The fleet, with six battalions of regular forces on board, arrived, on the twentieth of September, in Quimperly Bay, ten miles distant from the city, which was immediately summoned to surrender. In the first emotions of surprise and consternation, a capitulation was agreed to, on condition that the magazines of the Company, upon the payment of forty thousand pounds by way of ransom, should remain untouched, and the inhabitants be protected from pillage. These terms the British Commanders, instigated by the predominating avidity of plunder, haughtily and rashly rejected; and the inhabitants, driven to extremity, prepared to defend themselves with resolution. The invaders were utterly destitute of the artillery and implements necessary for a siege. A single battery, raised with difficulty and mounted only with a few field-pieces, played upon the fortifications without any effect. At length the troops stationed in the environs, with the militia of the province, collecting in great force, the General was compelled to abandon his enterprize, embarking his his troops September 29, and, after some useless bravadoes on the French coast, the whole armament returned to Portsmouth. The French accounts assert, that the place, if attacked immediately on the landing of the troops, might have been easily taken by escalade; but the operations of the English General indicated as little of vigor as of judgment; and the Admiral did nothing to retrieve the reputation which, notwithstanding the acquittal of the court-martial, he had, by his conduct at Toulon, lost in the estimation of the public. In the month of September, the important settlement of Madras, on the coast of Coromandel, surrendered to the French arms in India; which disaster the English, in the course of the next year, attempted in vain to avenge by the unsuccessful siege of Pondicherry.

In November 1746, the Parliament was again convened, and the supplies again voted with the same lavish profusion—four hundred and thirty thousand pounds to the Queen of Hungary; three hundred thousand pounds to the King of Sardinia; five hundred and seventy thousand pounds for the maintenance of the Hanoverian and Hessian auxiliaries; subsidies to the Electors of Saxony, Mentz, Cologne, and Bavaria; five hundred thousand pounds as a vote of credit; and it was remarked, that the entire aggregate of the supplies exceeded by two millions and a half the greatest annual sum raised during the reign of Queen Anne, when Great Britain filled the world with the renown of her victories, though her riches were now exhausted to purchase only disgrace and misfortune. It must be acknowledged indeed, that, at this period, the King exhibited a laudable proof of his desire to diminish the public expense, by ordering the third and fourth troops of his life-guards to be disbanded, and reducing three regiments of horse to the quality of dragoons. But these reductions were, at the same time, invidious and ineffectual, and the dignity of the nation seemed even in some sort affected by them. That the Monarch was well satisfied with the rectitude of his own policy, and even willing to make considerable personal sacrifices, in order to fix that ideal balance of power which he deemed so necessary to the happiness and tranquillity of Europe, it would seem ungenerous to doubt. Happy! had the wisdom of his measures borne any proportion to the integrity of his intentions.

An Act of Parliament of a very important nature passed this Session, for the abolition of the heretable jurisdictions in Scotland—that distinguishing feature of the feudal system; since which period the peculiarities which seemed to stamp upon the Highland clans the cast and character of a separate nation have been gradually softening, and, at this time, time, seem rapidly hastening to their final and utter extinction.

This year died Philip V. King of Spain, to whom succeeded, without any visible or immediate effect upon the general political system, Don Ferdinand, Prince of Asturias.

In April 1747, a squadron sailed from Brest Water, commanded by M. de la Jonquiere, bound for America, and had made little progress in their voyage when they were encountered by a superior English fleet, under the Admirals Anson and Warren. The enemy fought with courage, but were compelled to yield to superior force, and, towards evening, six ships of the line struck their colors, and a great part of their convoy, with several frigates, were also taken. For this service Admiral Anson was ennobled, and Admiral Warren created a Knight of the Bath. In the month of October, Admiral Hawke, with a force much superior, fell in with a fleet of nine line of battle ships, seven of which, after an obstinate engagement, were captured by the English. The nation failed not to remark, that, in both these instances, the English fleets bore down upon the enemy, regardless of the preservation of the line of battle; while the brave Admiral Matthews still continued in a state of disgraceful suspension for the same contempt of the established punctilios of discipline.

The Parliament having been dissolved in June, a new Parliament was convened in November 1747, highly favorable to the interest of the present Ministry. The minds of all were visibly animated by the late naval successes; the ablest men in Parliament were engaged in the different posts and offices of government; the Minister, Mr. Pelham, had acquired much of the public confidence; and the popularity of the King himself had very sensibly increased since the suppression of the late rebellion. He declared, that the attachment of his people on that occasion had impressed his heart with indelible sensations of gratitude, and that he felicitated himself upon an event, without which he had never known how much he was the object of their regard and affection. Opposition now seemed to languish, and, for the first time since the accession of the House of Hanover, England might be said to be governed by a popular administration *. The King signified,

* About this time a very excellent performance, deservedly honored with a large share of the public approbation, appeared under the title of "Free and Candid Disquisitions" respecting the necessity of a reform in the national Church. The celebrated Warburton, in a letter to his friend Dr. Doddridge, a dissenting teacher of great eminence, writes—"As to the 'Disquisitions,' I will only say, that the temper, candor, and charity, with which they are wrote, are very edifying and exemplary. I wish success to them as much as you can do. But I can tell you, of certain science, that not the least alteration will be made in the ecclesignified, in his speech to the Parliament, that a congress would speedily be opened at Aix-la-Chapelle, ecclesiastical system." Dr. Chandler, another non-conformist divine of distinguished reputation and ability, making an occasional visit at this period to Dr. Gooch, Bishop of Norwich, met with Dr. Sherlock, then Bishop of Salisbury. The discourse happened to fall on the propriety and utility of a comprehension. Dr. Sherlock said, "Our church, Mr. Chandler, consists of three parts, doctrine, discipline, and ceremonies. As to ceremonies, they are in themselves indifferent, and ought to be left so; and the discipline of our church is *; but what have you to object to the doctrines of it?" Mr. Chandler replied, "Your Articles, my Lord, must be expressed in Scriptural words, and the Athanasian Creed must be discarded." Both the Bishops answered—they wished they were rid of that Creed, and had no objection to altering the Articles into Scriptural words. The two Bishops, at the conclusion of the visit, requested Mr. Chandler to wait on the Archbishop, Dr. Herring, which he did, and met the Bishop of Norwich. The Archbishop being informed by Dr. Gooch of the conversation that had taken place on the subject of a comprehension, replied, "A very good thing—he wished it with all his heart; and the rather, because this was a time which called upon all good men to unite against infidelity and immorality, which threatened universal ruin: And added, he was encouraged to hope, from the piety, learning, and moderation, of many dissenters, that this was the proper time to make the attempt." But, said Dr. Gooch, Mr. Chandler says the Articles must be altered into the words of Scripture. "And why not?" rejoined the Archbishop, it is the impertinencies of men thrusting their own words into Articles, instead of the words of God, which have occasioned most of the divisions in the Christian Church from the beginning to this day." The Archbishop added, that the Bench of Bishops seemed to be of his pelle, for concerting the means of a general pacification. As the event, however, was uncertain, the former supplies and subsidies were renewed, and a new demand made for an additional subsidy to the Empress of Russia, whom England had, by this means, the honor to class with the Empress-Queen of Hungary, the Kings of Denmark, Sweden, Poland, and Sardinia, and a multitude of Germanic Sovereigns, in her imperial, royal, and princely band of mercenaries. But, previous to the termination of the Session, in May 1748, the King informed the two Houses that preliminaries of peace were actually signed, and that the basis of the accommodation was a general restitution of conquests. If we take into consideration the relative situation of the belligerent powers, the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle must undoubtedly, upon the whole, be considered as very favorable and advantageous to the Allies. The King of France was now in actual possession of almost the whole of the Austrian Netherlands, and had even penetrated into Dutch Brabant and Flanders. Except the fortune of the mind, and that he should be glad to see Mr. Chandler again, but was then OBLIGED TO GO TO COURT. The good Archbishop, it may be presumed, according to the prediction of Dr. Warbuton, met with little encouragement at COURT to persevere in his benevolent design; for, during the remainder of this reign, we hear no more of ecclesiastical REFORM OR COMPRE-HENSION.

war

war had, contrary to all reasonable expectation, entirely changed, the Allies must soon have been driven beyond the Rhine, and the United States might have once more seen the Oriflamme of France displayed at the gates of Amsterdam. The history of Europe in modern times exhibits, perhaps, no instance of a disparity of talents between opposing Commanders so great and manifest, as that which subsisted between the Duke of Cumberland and the Mareschal Saxe. Yet it is very remarkable, that the States-General seemed to think it unnecessary to impose those restraints upon his Royal Highness by which, in consequence of the tribunitian negative vested in the field deputies, the Duke of Marlborough had been formerly fettered. A vast army was assembled in the Netherlands at a ruinous expense to England, without the slightest necessity, as it was not pretended that the French had threatened the Dutch barrier—and which, when assembled, acted merely upon the defensive—which attempted no siege—which relieved no fortrefs—and which gained no battle. And the nation had reason to recollect the coarse, but sagacious political adage of Hyde, Earl of Rochester, “that to attack France in Flanders was to take a bull by the horns.” For the sacrifice of all her conquests no other compensation was required by France than the cession of the Dutchy of Parma, with its appendages, to the Infant Don Philip, and of which terri-

territories that Prince was already in actual possession. Thus, in the space of little more than ten years, the House of Austria was deprived of the Sicilies and Parma by Spain, of the rich and extensive province of Silesia by Prussia, and of Servia and Belgrade, the bulwark of her empire on the side of Hungary, by the Turks; yet, by the wise and excellent administration of the Empress-Queen, whose counsels were, from this period, chiefly directed by that great Statesman who, to a very recent period, presided at the helm of affairs in the Imperial Court *, Austria appeared, in a short time, more potent and formidable than it had ever done under the imperious but feeble government of her father, the Emperor Charles VI. By this treaty England was compelled reluctantly to resign her favorite conquest of Cape Breton, in order to obtain the restitution of Madras. With Spain England had little occasion to negotiate. In the whole course of a war which had continued nine years, nothing had been lost, and nothing gained, Porto Bello excepted, which had been immediately evacuated. The original cause of the war seemed, in the progress of it, to be entirely forgotten, and, at the conclusion of the peace, not a syllable was mentioned respecting the pretended right of search, which had formerly occasioned such loud and indignant clamors. As the same complaints have never been revived, it appears, however, that Spain has virtually, though silently, relinquished her claims. The settlement of the boundaries of the French and British empires in America, a question in the highest degree doubtful and disputatious, was referred to the decision of commissaries; and France retained no mark of superiority in this treaty, with relation to England, excepting the requisition of hostages to reside in France till the reciprocal restitution of conquests should be actually made; and the Earls of Suffex and Cathcart were nominated for that purpose. This afforded the Patriots a pretence to exclaim against the peace as disgraceful to the nation. But the nation, who were with reason wearied with the expenses and disasters of the war, were well satisfied with the terms of the peace, and it was celebrated with great and universal rejoicings. The opposition in Parliament, nevertheless, still retained some degree of importance, from the countenance and patronage of the Prince of Wales, who, from recent causes, had become more than ever alienated from the Court. And, at this period, his Royal Highness distinguished by peculiar marks of his favor and confidence, the famous Viscount Bolingbroke, who having, many years since, received a full pardon from government, without however being restored to his seat in Parliament, now resided at the rustic mansion manſion of Dawley, in Middleſex; and was viſited in this beautiful and ſequeſtered retreat, to make uſe of the expreſſion of a cotemporary hiſtorian, “ as a fainted ſhrine by all the diſtinguiſhed votaries of wit, eloquence, and political ambition.” Matured and mellowed by experience, reflection, and age, this all-accomplished Nobleman, “ framed in the prodigality of nature,” and no leſs conſpicuous in the lofty fanes of ſcience, than the roſy bowers of pleaſure, or the gorgeous palaces of ambition, ſhone forth in the evening of life with a mild and ſubdued, but rich and reſplendent luſtre. And, in his political writings, he exhibited to an admiring world that IDEA of a PATRIOT KING, which the heir of the Britiſh Monarchy was ſuppoſed ambitious to form himſelf upon, as a complete and perfect model *. The hopes of the nation

* The Count, afterwards created Prince de Kaunitz.

* It will be, perhaps, not unacceptable to ſelect a few extracts from this celebrated performance, in compoſing which, Lord Bolingbroke ſeems to have determined to lay aſide all prejudice and party attachment, and to pourtray the lineaments of Truth, as ſhe appeared to his imagination, in her own heavenly and radiant form; and which derives an high additional value from its proceeding from a writer who poſſeſſed an intimate practical knowlege of his ſubject, and who has, therefore, ſteered perfectly clear of thoſe viſionary ideas of government which have unhappily blended themſelves with the theories of many philoſophical ſtatists. “ In all caſes of great concernment, the noble writer tells us, that the ſhorteſt and ſureſt method of arriving at real knowlege is to remount to firſt principles; for tion were, however, fatally blasted by the unfortunate and untimely death of the Prince, who, after a short

for it is about them that almost all the juggling and legerdemaine employed by men, whose trade it is to deceive, are set to work. And he who does so on the subject of government, will discover soon that the notions concerning the divine institution and right of Kings, as well as the absolute power belonging to their office, have no foundation in fact or reason; but have risen from an OLD ALLIANCE between ecclesiastical and civil policy. Reverence for government obliges us to reverence governors, who, for the sake of it, are raised above the level of other men. But reverence for governors independently of government, any farther than reverence would be due to their virtues if they were private men, is preposterous, and repugnant to common sense. As well might we say, that a ship is built, and loaded, and manned, for the sake of any particular pilot, instead of acknowledging that the pilot is made for the sake of the ship, her lading, and her crew, who are always the OWNERS in the political vessel, as to say that Kingdoms were instituted for Kings, not Kings for Kingdoms. All this is as true of hereditary as of elective Monarchy; though the SCRIBBLERS for tyranny, under the name of Monarchy, would have us believe that there is something more august and more sacred in the one than the other. They are sacred alike, and this attribute is to be ascribed, or not ascribed to them, as they answer, or do not answer, the ends of their institution.—Enough has been said to establish the first and true principles of monarchical, and indeed of every other kind of government; and I will say with confidence, that no principles but these, and such as these, can be advanced, which deserve to be treated seriously; though Mr. Locke condescended to examine those of Filmer, more out of regard to the prejudices of the time than the importance of the work. The good of the People is the ultimate and true end of government; governors

a short illness, expired, March 20, 1751, leaving the education of his numerous offspring to the care of governors are therefore appointed for this end, and the civil constitution which appoints them and invests them with their power, is determined to do so, by that law of nature and reason which has determined the end of government, and which admits this form of government as the proper means of arriving at it. Now, the greatest good of a People is their liberty; without liberty no happiness can be enjoyed by society. The obligation, therefore, to defend and maintain the freedom of such constitutions, will appear most sacred to a PATRIOT KING. The constitution will be considered by him as one law, consisting of two tables—or as one system composed of different parts and powers, but all duly proportioned to one another, and conspiring, by their harmony, to the perfection of the whole. He will make one, and but one, distinction between his rights and those of his People,—he will look on his to be a trust, and theirs a property; he will discern that he can have a right to no more than is entrusted to him by the constitution; and that the People alone, who had an original right to the whole by the law of nature, can have the sole indefeasible right to any part, and really have such a right to that part, which they have reserved to themselves. Thus he will think, and on these principles he will act, whether he come to the throne by immediate or remote election. For in hereditary Monarchies, where men are not elected, families are; and therefore some authors would have it believed, that, when a family has been once admitted, and an hereditary right to the Crown recognised in it, that right cannot be forfeited. How much more agreeable to truth and to common sense would these authors have written, if they had maintained that every Prince who comes to a Crown in the course of succession, were he the last of five hundred, comes to it under the same conditions under which the first took it, whether expressed or implied. I mention of a Princess, amiable, indeed, for her maternal and domestic virtues, but who had brought from the Court of Saxe-Gotha principles and maxims of government ill according with those which form the basis of the English constitution. Soon after the death of his Royal Highness, his eldest son, Prince George, was committed to the care of the Earl of Harcourt, as governor, and the Bishop of Norwich as preceptor—men whose principles and characters deservedly stood high in the esteem of the nation. But it was soon discovered that the Earl of Bute, who had been introduced into the Prince's household as a Lord of the Bedchamber, tion this the rather because I have an imperfect remembrance that some SCRIBBLER was employed, or employed himself, to assert the hereditary right of the present family; a task so unnecessary to any good purpose, that I believe a suspicion arose of its having been designed for a bad one. A PATRIOT KING will never countenance such impertinent fallacies, nor deign to lean on rotten reeds."—Was this recollection in Lord Bolingbroke, or prophetic anticipation? or is it necessary to say, that whoever defends the absurd and pernicious tenets here reprobated is a SCRIBBLER, however sublime and beautiful his language? A Nobleman yet living, who was in habits of strict intimacy with Lord Bolingbroke, relates of him, that he was accustomed to express, in high and enthusiastic language, his admiration of the genius and talents of ALCIBIADES, not unconscious, perhaps, that to the character of this celebrated Athenian his own bore a striking analogy. And Lord Orrery assures us, that the conversation of Lord Bolingbroke united the wisdom of Socrates, the dignity and ease of Pliny, and the wit of Horace.

had

had acquired so high a degree of influence at the Court of Leicester House, as to make the situation of those who possessed responsible offices very uneasy. It was confidently asserted, that books had been repeatedly found in the hands of the Prince of a most dangerous political tendency. On a remarkable motion made in the House of Peers, March 1753, by the Duke of Bedford, for the production of certain papers and documents relative to this subject, Lord Harcourt declared that he found he had no authority over the Prince's education, nor could he be of any service unless the sub-governor, and others, were dismissed, whom he had strong reasons to believe tainted with Jacobite principles. Impressed with this idea, his Lordship and his co-adjutor, the Bishop, resigned their offices, and to them Lord Waldegrave and the Bishop of Lincoln succeeded. But the baleful influence of the Earl of Bute was too plainly discerned to be still all-prevalent, affording, notwithstanding the private and personal virtues of the Prince, just and serious ground of national solicitude and apprehension*.

Next

* In the Diary of Lord Melcombe, which exhibits an amusing picture of the interior of a Court, delineated by a vain, obsequious, temporising courtier, are contained many characteristic and interesting anecdotes. With respect to this memorable resignation, his Lordship informs us, that Lord Harcourt complained strongly to the King of dangerous notions, and arbitrary principles, being instilled into the Prince; and that he could be
of

Next to the Minister himself, two of the most distinguished personages at this period in the British Parliament were Mr. Murray, Solicitor General, and Mr. Pitt, Paymaster of the Forces—both, indeed, possessing an extent of genius and splendor of eloquence superior to Mr. Pelham, who, founding his power on the firm and solid foundation of public esteem and public virtue, suffered no mean or corroding political jealousies to enter his breast. The first of these, promoted, in the progress of his fortunes, to the Chief Justiceship of England, and the title of Earl of Mansfield, was educated in sentiments by no means favorable to his political ad-of no use unless Stone, Cresset, and Scot, were dismissed: That, as he named no particulars, the King had sent the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Lord Chancellor to confer with his Lordship upon the subject; but Lord Harcourt declared, that the particulars were fit only to be communicated to the King, and that he would wait on his Majesty with them: That he did so, and the satisfaction he required not being given, the King appearing to yield a slow and reluctant credit to these allegations, the Earl and Bishop immediately resigned their offices. It is a curious circumstance, that, in a conversation which Lord Melcombe held with the Duke of Dorset on the subject of these resignations, it was agreed—"that there must be a counter-story on the court side, or the resigners would run away with the public opinion." It is superfluous to say, that this counter-story never appeared. The original appointment of Stone, who was the intimate friend of Murray, the Solicitor General, was extremely disagreeable to the late Prince of Wales, who was accustomed, as the Princess related to Lord Melcombe, when affairs went ill, passionately to exclaim—"How could better be expected when such a Jacobite as Stone was trusted!"

vancement; but, from his first entrance into public life, he suffered no symptoms of his original attachments to appear, excepting a certain bias always discernible, throughout all the variations and vicissitudes of his political career, in favor of prerogative. His person was graceful, the tones of his voice exquisitely melodious, and his style of oratory clear, dignified, calm, and persuasive *. To this historical portrait that of Mr. Pitt may be exhibited as a just and striking contrast. This celebrated Statesman was introduced early in life into the House of Commons, where he soon distinguished himself by the animation of his eloquence and the superiority of his talents. His reply to the political veteran Horace Walpole, who had on some occasion affected to mention him with contempt, as an unpractised and youthful orator, is not yet forgotten: "Whether youth could be justly imputed to any man as a reproach, Mr. Pitt said, he should not determine; but he would affirm, that the wretch who, after having seen the consequences of repeated errors, continues still to blunder, and whose age has only added obstinacy to stupidity, deserves not that his grey hairs should secure him from insult; and much more is he to be abhorred who, as he

* The era so feelingly anticipated by the Poet is at length arrived. This Nobleman's career of life and honor is closed—

And MURRAY, long enough his country's pride, Is now no more than TULLY or than HYDE.

has

has advanced in age, has receded from virtue, and who deliberately devotes the remnant of his life to the ruin of his country." As a public speaker, he possessed such commanding force and energy of language, as struck his hearers with astonishment and admiration. The power and effect of his oratory have been compared to "the lightning which flashed from heaven, blasting where it smote, and withering the nerves of opposition." His ambition was open and undisguised; but he disdained to seek the gratification of it by any mean or degrading compliance. On the contrary, he was pertinacious in his opinions, imperious in his deportment, fearless and resolute in his conduct. All attention to pecuniary considerations he seemed to think beneath the dignity of his character, ever maintaining an inviolable integrity in the midst of temptation*. And in that theatre of political corruption in

* Two signal proofs of the disinterested integrity of Mr. Pitt in the discharge of his office, are distinctly specified. On his accession to the post of Paymaster, he refused the customary perquisites of half per cent. on the subsidies voted by Parliament to the Queen of Hungary, the King of Sardinia, &c. amounting to an immense sum. The King of Sardinia, struck with admiration at this conduct, ordered his Ambassador to offer the same sum as a royal present to Mr. Pitt; but this Mr. Pitt peremptorily, though respectfully, refused, saying, that he did no more than his duty in paying it entire. The other fact, equally to the honor of this great man, is, that he would never appropriate any of the balances of the public money in his

in which it was the shameless boast of the Minister, that every man had his price, the public virtue of Mr. Pitt was universally acknowledged to be "pure as the icicle pendent from Dian's temple."

In the foremost rank of Statesmen at this period, likewise, must be classed the Secretary at War, Mr. Fox, afterwards advanced to the Peerage by the title of Lord Holland. His talents appear, indeed, less brilliant than solid. Long and intimately attached to the connection of the Pelhams, he had, on all occasions, distinguished himself as a most able advocate of the measures of the present administration. In common with the other adherents of that powerful party, he espoused with zeal the antient principles of whiggism established at the Revolution—blended as they were with the courtly biases in favor of the new system of policy introduced at the accession of the present family. His understanding was vigorous, and his knowledge extensive; and he commanded the attention of the House not by the splendor of his eloquence, but the superior weight and force of his observations. Though far from harboring the idea of a political competition with Mr. Pelham, whom he supported with the cordiality rather of friendship than of interest, he regarded himself, and was universally hands to any purposes of private emolument, paying them invariably into the Bank of England, and satisfying himself with the common legal appointments annexed to his office.

regarded,

regarded, as second only in political importance to the Minister; nor, in case of a vacancy in the highest department of government, did there appear any probability of a contest for the pre-eminence—Mr. Pitt at this period, not to mention his inferior standing in office, boasting little advantage over Mr. Fox in the estimation of the public, and possessing much less of the confidence of the Court.

The most considerable controversy which took place in the House of Commons, during the session immediately succeeding the conclusion of the peace, was occasioned by some important innovations in the annual mutiny bill, particularly the final clause, by which martial law was extended to all officers on half pay, and which, by extending in the same proportion the influence of the Crown, might in its consequences, as the opposition affirmed, prove very dangerous to the Constitution. But Mr. Pitt defended the clause, which was ultimately carried by a considerable majority, as a necessary extension of military discipline—urging, in order to obviate the alarm of danger, “that the very existence of English liberty must, and did, actually depend upon the moderation of the Sovereign, and the virtue of the army. To that virtue, said he, we trust even at this hour, small as our army is—to that virtue we must have trusted in whatever manner this bill had been modelled; and without this virtue should the Lords, the Commons, and the People of England, entrench themselves behind parchment up to the teeth, the sword will find a passage to the vitals of the Constitution." Certainly a more forcible argument could not be found to demonstrate the necessity of reducing that army, and of diminishing that influence, which the clause in question was calculated to confirm and increase. At this period, a plan was formed and carried into execution, chiefly under the patronage and direction of the Earl of Halifax, first Lord of Trade and Plantations, for the establishment of a colony on the peninsula of Acadie. By the treaty of Utrecht this peninsula, originally settled by the French, was ceded, with the entire province of Nova Scotia, to the English. But the small town and fortress of Annapolis, situated in the midst of the French settlers, excepted, no trace appeared of its being an English possession. By the plan now adopted, it was determined to found a city on the opposite or eastern side of the peninsula, to which the name of Halifax was given, on a spot commodiously situated, and with the advantage of a secure and excellent harbor. This colony, though viewed by the French with jealous eyes, being primarily designed for a military station, and subjected, by an unpardonable error in the original plan, to a military and despotic form of government, did not answer the high expectations excited by it: But of late years, in consequence of many judicious regulations and unexpected changes, it has risen rapidly in commercial and political importance.

judi-

From the firm establishment of peace, the extension of commerce, and the accumulation of wealth, the public funds, all of which bore the same interest of four per cent. now rose so much above par, as to make it practicable for the Minister to bring forward a grand measure of finance, which, however daring in appearance, was attended with no difficulty in the execution. This was no other than an improvement of the scheme formerly offered to Parliament by Sir John Bernard, to liquidate all the redeemable annuities, comprehending almost the whole of the public debts, by an immediate payment of the principal. This proposal was, however, attended with an alternative which the Minister well knew it was the interest of the stock-holder to accept. An option was allowed by the act either to receive the entire amount of the debt at par, i. e. at a discount of more than thirty per cent. below the actual transfer price, or to consent to a reduction of the interest from four to three and a half per cent. for seven years, and afterwards to remain at three per cent. This had all the effect and operation of a tax of twenty-five per cent. upon the public funds, and it was a blow most severely felt by very many families in the middle classes of life, whose property was confided to the faith of government. Yet no violation of the public faith could be pretended; for, in conformity to the original terms of the agreement, the perpetual annuities were at all times redeemable by the government at par. A very great proportion, therefore, of the public creditors assented, however reluctantly, to the terms of the Minister. The three great chartered Companies, nevertheless, and various individual proprietors of stock, to the amount of eight or ten millions, refused to subscribe. But Mr. Pelham, encouraged by the general success of his project, now assumed an higher tone; and he declared that, as they had suffered the time prescribed by the act to elapse, they should no longer be admitted to take advantage of the terms originally offered. But, that their obstinacy and ignorance might not be too rigorously punished, he would now propose a second subscription, in which the reduction of the interest from three and a half to three per cent. should take place at the end of five years. Upon reconsideration, the Bank, the East India Company, and South Sea Company, and the individual proprietors who had concurred with them, and were probably influenced by their authority to reject with disdain the former proposition, unanimously thought proper to accept of the favor and indulgence now offered; and the plan of the Minister was carried into complete execution, not only with reputation but

but triumph. But it is remarkable, that no effort was at any time made by Mr. Pelham for the re-establishment of the sinking fund, as originally proposed by Sir Robert Walpole, a measure of much greater efficacy, though of less eclat, than this boasted scheme of reduction.

About this time, an Act of Parliament also passed for the encouragement of the British Fisheries, by which a company was incorporated, in order to carry into effect the purposes of the act. But as the vessels designed to rendezvous at the sound of Brassa were, according to this project, to be fitted out at the port of London, to mention no other of its numerous defects, it was clearly foreseen, and peremptorily foretold, that the scheme would prove abortive. Various efforts have since been made, at different times, to revive the public attention to this national concern, but with little success. And it yet remains for some future able and patriotic Minister to adopt a grand and comprehensive plan, for the accomplishment of this most important and laudable object. Had a tenth part of the immense sums dissipated and squandered in Italian and German subsidies been employed in erecting towns, forming canals, building vessels, and procuring implements, in order to carry on the fisheries to advantage upon the spot, the Highlands of Scotland might, at this day, have exhibited a smiling scene of industry and plenty, instead of presenting to our view the cheerless aspect of poverty and wretchedness, or rather the hideous picture of solitude and desolation.

Philip V. of Spain, whose partiality to France seemed to increase with increasing years, being now deceased, and his son and successor Ferdinand cherishing a sincere desire to maintain a perfect amity with Great Britain, a treaty or convention was this year concluded at Madrid, between Don Joseph de Carvajal, the Spanish Minister, and Mr Keene, the English Envoy, by which the points referred to the decision of Commissaries, by the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, were finally terminated, and the commercial privileges of the English nation fully restored. No mention, however, and much less any direct renunciation, was made of the right of search claimed by the Spaniards, and which was the original cause of the war. And when this omission was strongly urged by the opposition in Parliament, as inconsistent with the positive declaration of the two Houses at the commencement of the war, who concurred in an address to the Throne, that no treaty of peace with Spain should be admitted unless such renunciation should be first obtained as a preliminary, Mr. Pitt, who had been a strenuous advocate for this address, offered an apology for his conduct, as a Minister of the Crown concurring in the measures now the subject of censure, somewhat novel and singular. "He acknowledged that he had contended strongly for the address alluded to, because at that time, being young and sanguine, he thought it right and reasonable. But he was now ten years older, had considered matters more coolly, and was convinced that the privilege of no search with respect to British vessels sailing near the American shore, would never be obtained unless Spain should be brought so low as to acquiesce in any terms we, as victors, might propose." This was a virtual vindication of the conduct and principles of the late Minister, Sir Robert Walpole, in his negotiations with Spain, against which Mr. Pitt had so often and so eloquently declaimed; and such an avowal could only be regarded as an involuntary species of homage paid to the memory of that sagacious and able Statesman.
acknow-

In the course of the present summer, 1750, died Don Juan V. King of Portugal; a Prince not destitute of ability, but tainted with a wretched spirit of bigotry and persecution. He was succeeded by his son Don Joseph, at whose accession the Infanta Isabella became heiress of the crown. And, in order to preserve the sceptre of Portugal in the House of Braganza, this Princess, by virtue of a Papal dispensation, was married to her uncle the Infant Don Pedro, brother to the King; the first issue of which nuptials, Joseph Xavier, Prince of Brazil, while of an age yet immature, was, by a similar alliance—an alliance at which nature and custom equally revolt—married to his aunt Donna Maria, sister to Isabella, the present Queen.
a simi-

In consequence of the death of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, a Bill was presented by the Duke of Newcastle to the House of Peers (May 1751), to provide for the administration of government, in case the crown should descend to a minor: And the Princess Dowager of Wales was appointed Regent of Great Britain and Ireland, assisted by a council composed of the great Officers of State, the Duke of Cumberland presiding at the head. This was a hazardous and dangerous plan, which, had it been carried into effect, would have laid the foundation of a divided and distracted government. Happily, however, the King lived till his successor attained to the age of majority, and the regency bill, which was justly and strongly opposed in Parliament, sunk unnoticed into silence and oblivion. Amongst the most remarkable bills of the present Session was that introduced by the Earl of Chesterfield, for the reformation of the Calendar, notwithstanding the previous and avowed disapprobation of the Duke of Newcastle, who declared himself “averse to disturb that which was at rest; adding, that he did not love new-fangled things.” The bill, however, was received with general applause, and was supported in the House of Peers by the Earl of Macclesfield, with a display of profound and and scientific knowlege which reflected upon that Nobleman the highest honor, as the successor to the chair of NEWTON, and President of the most learned society in Europe. The Julian computation of time, either from ignorance or negligence, supposing a complete solar revolution to be effected in the precise period of three hundred and sixty-five days and six hours, made no provision for the apparently trifling deficiency of eleven minutes, which however, in the lapse of eighteen centuries, amounted to a difference of eleven days. A reformation of the Calendar had been accomplished in the sixteenth century, under the auspices of Pope Gregory XIII.; but the authority of the Roman Pontiff extending over the Catholic countries only, the ancient computation still continued in use in England and the other northern kingdoms. But by the bill now introduced, it was decreed that the new year should begin, in conformity to the Gregorian reform, on the first of January, and that eleven intermediate nominal days, between the second and fourteenth of September 1752, should be omitted, so that the day succeeding the second, should be denominated the fourteenth of that month—an alteration not less favorable to commercial than to astronomical accuracy and precision.

Frederic, King of Sweden, and Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, dying at this period, was succeeded, agreeably

agreeably to the convention formerly made with Russia, by Adolphus Frederic, Duke of Holstein Eutin, Bishop of Lubec—married to the sister of his Prussian Majesty. This Prince, on his accession to the throne, took a voluntary oath in full senate that he would never attempt to introduce a despotic authority, but would maintain their liberties with his blood, and govern his subjects in all respects according to the laws and form of government established in Sweden. This declaration was peculiarly acceptable to the Court of St. Petersburg, which had entertained jealous apprehensions that the intrigues of the French and Prussian factions, for changing the form of government, were countenanced and supported by the successor—and had actually assembled an army on the frontiers of Finland, which menaced Sweden with invasion; declaring, at the same time, her firm resolution to maintain inviolate that constitution of which she was the guarantee. By this complaisant, or rather submissive, conduct, the harmony between the two countries appeared firmly consolidated. The political depression of Sweden, which was the necessary consequence of the radical defects of her government, was in the highest degree favorable to the ambitious designs of Russia; and, in conformity to the same insidious and interested policy, the Court of St. Petersburg will suffer no improvement of the anarchic constitution of Poland. A violent misunderstanding derstanding between the two Courts of Petersburg and Berlin was the result of their opposing politics relative to the affairs of Sweden—his Prussian Majesty declaring his determination to defend that kingdom with his whole force, in case of an attack from Russia; and the Ambassadors on each side were recalled. This misunderstanding, heightened by mutual criminations and reproaches into the most bitter animosity, after an interval of some years, terminated in open rupture: And the King of Prussia was taught, by fatal experience, to repent the gross and wanton provocations by which he had ventured to excite the resentment of the Czarina. It is worthy of remark, that the subsidies received, during the course of his reign from England, by the late King of Sweden in the mere capacity of Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, on an accurate computation, amounted to the astonishing sum of one million two hundred and forty-nine thousand six hundred and ninety-nine pounds sterling*. In the course of this year, 1751, also died Louisa, Queen of Denmark, youngest daughter of his Britannic Majesty, a Princess endowed with every

* Soon after the death of the King of Sweden, Prince Frederic of Hesse Cassel, who had, in 1740, espoused the Princess Mary, third daughter of the King of England, thought fit to renounce his religion, and declare himself a Roman Catholic, to the great injury of the Protestant interest in the Empire, and the general regret of the English nation and the Protestants throughout Europe.

graceful

graceful and amiable accomplishment, and deservedly dear to the Danish Monarch and nation. Nearly at the same time, the United Provinces sustained a public loss by the death of his Serene Highness the Prince of Orange, who leaving only an infant son, the administration of the government devolved upon the Princess of Orange, as gover-nante, during the minority, in which station she conducted affairs with much prudence and ability. When the Parliament met in November (1751), the King informed them that he had, in conjunction with the States General, whose intimate union and friendship with England had been in no degree impaired by the unfortunate death of the Stadtholder, concluded treaties with the Electors of Bavaria and Saxony, in addition to those subsisting with the Electors of Mentz and Cologne; and another was soon afterwards happily adjusted with the Elector Palatine; and the vast sums which these Princes demanded as the purchase of their friendship were cheerfully and loyally voted at the requisition of the Court. The immediate object of these alliances was to secure a majority of the voices of the Electoral College, in the view of an approaching election of a King of the Romans in the person of the Archduke Joseph, eldest son of the Emperor: For this Prince having yet scarcely passed the years of infancy, it was reasonably to be apprehended, that this favorite project might, in the execution, execution, be attended with embarrassment and difficulty. A vigorous, however, if not a formidable resistance was made in the House of Commons to the ratification of these treaties by Parliament. For some years past Lord Egmont had been regarded as the head of the anti-courtiers—a Nobleman whose knowledge and talents were considerably above mediocrity, but whose opposition was too palpably indiscriminate and personal; and the voice of the minority in the House of Commons was no longer the voice of the majority of the people. This was an occasion, however, which furnished his Lordship with a wide scope for argument as well as invective. “He declared himself an enemy to all subsidy-treaties in time of peace. The views and circumstances of Princes and States were perpetually changing, and their decisions would ever be influenced by present interests, and not past obligations, of which, he said, we had full proof during the last war in the conduct of the Danes and Hessians, the former of whom deserted us, and the latter had actually engaged against us. By entering into treaties of this nature, without the previous authority of Parliament, he acknowledged the House was indeed reduced to a disagreeable dilemma—they must either expose their Sovereign to the contempt of foreign powers, or they must sacrifice the interests of their constituents by imposing unnecessary burdens upon the country. But of two evils he would chuse the least, by refusing the subsidies, and endeavor to vindicate the honor of the Sovereign by punishing those Ministers who advised such pernicious measures." Sir John Hynde Cotton forcibly remarked, that France was one of the guarantees of the treaty of Westphalia, and consequently of the liberties and constitution of the German Empire; and our thus granting subsidies to the Electors will furnish her with a plausible pretext for asserting that the liberties of the Empire are invaded by means of bribery and corruption; and may incite her to assume the character of the defender of the Germanic Constitution against such scandalous attempts. With regard, therefore, to the election of a King of the Romans, he was of opinion that the German Princes ought to be left entirely to themselves; and that the wisest course England could take was, by the establishment of an æconomical system and the effectual reduction of the national debt, to prepare for a future war whenever a real and national necessity to engage in a war should be proved to exist." It was also urged, in the course of the debate, that motives of policy no less than of æconomy militated against the granting of these subsidies; for, when we have taken the whole Electoral College into pay, they will certainly, for the sake of having the subsidies renewed and continued, put off from time to time, on such pleas as can never be wanting, the election until the death of the present Emperor; for, should the election be once made, the subsidies will of course cease. By the officious and invidious interposition of Great Britain, it was affirmed to be too probable that an intestine war in the Empire might be not prevented, as was alleged by the 'partizans of the Court, but excited: For the other two Colleges of the Diet would certainly join with France in protesting against the validity of an election so circumstanced; in which case, it might be reasonably expected that some of the Electors themselves, who now so readily accepted our bribes, might be bribed to act against us. The goodness of his Majesty's intentions no one presumed to doubt; but to compliment, in the mode now proposed, the depth of his wisdom, or the extent of his penetration, would be ridiculous. As to that "union with his allies," on which such stress seemed to be laid in his Majesty's speech from the throne, it was certainly very desirable if it could be effected without sacrificing the true interests of the nation: But there could be no sufficient reason for purchasing their friendship by extravagant subsidies, at a time when we had so little money to spare, since this union must always be a matter of much more importance to them than to us. England should at all times be slow and cautious of intermeddling in the affairs of the Continent, if we wished to avoid exciting resentments and jealousies. Were the liberties of Europe at this or any other crisis really endangered, the powers of the Continent would no doubt solicit with eagerness our assistance; whereas, we were now giving them bribes for permission to interpose when there was no reason to believe that the Empire at large were desirous of our interference, or would be benefited by it." The system of policy adopted by the English Court was not, however, to be shaken by such frivolous arguments; and after an inextricable tiffue of negotiations and intrigues, most assiduously carried on with the different German Princes, the Elector of Mentz, Chancellor of the Empire, at length convoked an Electoral Diet. But the King of Prussia, Elector of Brandenburg, who had, on the first indication of this design, manifested his dislike and disapprobation, now publicly opposed it with the utmost vehemence and pertinacity. "He declared the election in contemplation to be contrary to the laws and constitution of the Empire, as promulgated in the Golden Bull, and confirmed by the treaty of Westphalia, from which the Electoral College had no right to depart. In the cases only of long absence, continued indisposition, or accidental emergency, which could not now be pretended to exist, did the Imperial capitulations admit the lawfulness of proceeding to the election of a King of the Romans during the lifetime of the Emperor.

never

Emperor. And, should the Imperial Crown devolve to a minor, he affirmed, that many mischiefs and disorders must necessarily ensue, as the Constitutions of the Empire had established no regency for the government of it in a case unknown to all preceding times, but had only appointed Vicars during an actual vacancy of the Imperial Throne. That an election in these circumstances would be incompatible with the Germanic liberties, and with the fundamental privileges of the Princes and States of the Empire—that the Imperial dignity would be virtually changed from an elective to an hereditary succession, perpetuated in one family, which must thus be aggrandized to the prejudice of its co-estates, and the manifest subversion of the Constitution of the Empire.” In consequence of these spirited remonstrances of the Prussian Monarch, several of the Electors seemed to waver in their opinion, the King of France also solemnly protesting, “that although, for the sake of peace, he would not oppose this election, contrary as it was to the Golden Bull, provided it should be confirmed by the unanimous consent of the Electoral College; yet should ANY ONE of the Members signify his dissent, and claim the protection of France, he could not refuse granting his assistance, as guarantee of the treaty of Westphalia.” Attempts having been in vain made to soften the King of Prussia, the Courts of Vienna and London were at length comelled to desist from the prosecution of their design, though their Imperial Majesties could not refrain from displaying marks of the bitterest resentment at the conduct of the Prussian Monarch; and were evidently watching, with eager anxiety, for a favorable opportunity of revenge. The determined and resolute opposition of the King of Prussia to this measure, which he passes over, in the History of his Times, in deep and mysterious silence, seems best accounted for by the prevalent suspicion that, in case of the demise of the Emperor, he harbored a secret design of offering himself as a candidate for the Imperial Throne. And it is probable, that a knowledge or persuasion of the aspiring views of the Prussian Monarch principally incited the Court of Vienna to urge with such persevering ardor a project so irregular and invidious. At this period, the Courts of Berlin and London were scarcely less at variance than those of Vienna and Berlin; and the King of Prussia openly expressed his resentment of the conduct of the King of England, "who had, by the influence of English subsidies, embarrassed and embroiled the affairs of Germany, in which he had no right to interfere."

A profound tranquillity at this time prevailed throughout the island of Great Britain; and the attention of the Minister seemed, by a perfect novelty in politics, to be wholly engrossed in devising and bringing forward, for the discussion and appro-

approbation of Parliament, plans and propofals for the public good. Amongft other laudable and liberal projects, a bill, of a nature not very important indeed, was introduced and paffed in the Session of 1753, permitting the naturalization, under certain restrictions, of persons born out of the realm, profefling the Jewish religion *, it being fupposed, or at leaft hoped, that fuch a meafure would operate as an inducement to opulent foreigners of that perfuafion to remove with their effects to Great Britain, to the obvious increafe of the national commerce, credit, and profperity. A moft abfurd and unexpected alarm, however, was taken by the public at this juft and beneficial meafure; and it was afferted, that this adoption of vagrant Jews into the community, and invefting them with the rights of denizens, would rob the natives of their birth-right—would tend to deprive them, by fetting up a rivalfhip of intereft and induftry, of the means of employment—would endanger the Conftitution in Church and State, and would be an indelible reproach to the legiflature of a Chriftian nation. It was even affirmed, by fome heated enthusiasts, that this act was an impious attempt to invalidate the Scriptural prophefies, which declare that the

* This famous bill of naturalization gave no greater privileges to thofe who might be defirous of taking the advantage of it, than to Jews who were born in England, which are much inferior to thofe which they enjoy in many other countries.

Jews shall be a scattered people, possessing no fixed or settled habitation until their conversion to Christianity, and their consequent restoration to the promised land; though it certainly could not be pretended, that the nations of the earth are enjoined, by any precept of Christianity, to treat the Jews with injustice or inhumanity, in order to ensure the accomplishment of this prophecy. In the ensuing Session, however, the clamor continuing, and even increasing, the bill was repealed, as one of those necessary sacrifices which wisdom is occasionally compelled to offer at the altar of prejudice and folly. This was one of the last acts of Mr. Pelham's administration—that Minister dying, March 1754, in the meridian of his life, reputation, and usefulness. Rectitude of understanding and disposition seems to have constituted his leading characteristic. Whatever appears erroneous in his conduct proceeded chiefly from the imperfection and absurdity of that general system of politics, which he found too firmly established to be, without an effort too mighty, susceptible of any material alteration*. But the many excellent acts passed

* In a confidential conversation with Mr. Pelham, Lord Melcombe tells us that this Minister opened to him the bottom of his politics—"that he had a great regard for all Europe, but did not trouble himself much about it; that his concern was to keep things on a right foot at home; that he was at this period chiefly solicitous to have a thorough Whig Parliament chosen, which passed under his influence and patronage, plainly indicate an unremitted attention to the interest, and a sincere and earnest desire to promote the happiness, of his country. His genius was not of an enterprising cast, and, when occasionally urged to adopt more bold and vigorous measures of political reform, he was accustomed to answer, "that things would last his time." And the general tenor of his conduct shewed, that he was less anxious to avoid the censure of timidity than of rashness. He lived and died esteemed and lamented, both by the Sovereign and the nation*. Mr. Legge, a man

of which would make the remainder of his Majesty's life easy, and would settle the young Prince upon the throne so as to secure him the prospect of a prosperous reign. If they would let him do this, he was at their service; if not, he could be contented to be a private man as well as another. Touching upon the subsidies attending the election of a King of the Romans, Mr. Pelham's face fell, and he grew very uneasy upon it; and expressed much dislike of the way it was conducted. He said he was always against those subsidies; that his idea was, that, if the dissentient Electors would give in the ultimatum of their demands, and perform the conditions before they received the reward; then, indeed, when we were sure of our bargain, it might be worth considering whether it were prudent to pay the price; but to be buying one Elector after another was what he ABHORRED: It must have an end, and he had declared so in Parliament."

* To the mild and amiable character of this justly valued Minister,

of honor and capacity, after a short interval, succeeded Mr. Pelham as Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Seals being consigned to Sir Thomas Robinson, formerly Ambassador at the Court of Vienna, a Minister of very moderate political attainments, and little conversant in parliamentary intrigues and conflicts, the post of first Lord of the Treasury was occupied by the Duke of Newcastle. But it soon appeared how unequal were the talents of this Nobleman to the task of government, when deprived of the assistance of the counsellor and co-adjutor with whom he had been ever united in the strictest bands of political and fraternal amity. And the first remarkable incident of his administration too plainly shewed that public measures were no longer actuated by the wise and beneficent counsels of Mr. Pelham. Dr. Cameron, brother to the celebrated Cameron of Lochiel, had been engaged in the rebellion of 1745, and, after the decisive victory of Culloden, had effected his escape to the Continent. Notwithstanding his being attainted by act of Parliament, he ventured, after an interval of nine years, to return incognito to Scotland, in order to Minister, Mr. Pope has paid an elegant tribute of applause in one of his poetic Epistles:

“ Pleas’d let me own in Esher’s peaceful grove,
Where Kent and Nature vie for Pelham’s love,
The scene, the master, opening to my view,
I sit and dream I see my Craggs anew.”

transact

transact certain affairs of great consequence, but of a nature entirely private and personal—relying, in case of exigence, with fatal indiscretion, on the mildness and equity of the British government, now raised far above the apprehension of danger, on the temper of the times, and the general respectability of his own character. Being, however, by some means discovered, he was apprehended and brought to his trial at the Old Bailey; and his person being legally identified, he was convicted, and suffered the death of a traitor with admirable firmness and resignation. It is remarkable, that even the populace were melted into tears at the melancholy spectacle of his execution; generously lamenting the excessive rigor of his fate; which can never be justified upon any public principles of necessity or utility, and which bears the odious aspect of an act of obdurate and sanguinary revenge. A far more conspicuous proof, however, of the rashness and incapacity of the present administration, appeared in the haughty tenor of their conduct respecting the Parliament of Ireland, in an affair of great delicacy and importance—unmindful that the harp, emblematic of this kingdom, produces by means of soft and gentle touches only its genuine harmony. In the year 1749, a considerable surplus remaining in the Irish Exchequer, the House of Commons in that country, conceiving that they had an undoubted right to appropriate such surplus to national tional purposes, prepared heads of a bill with that design, to which was affixed the following preamble: "Whereas, on the 25th of March last, a considerable balance remained in the hands of the Vice-Treasurers, or Receivers-General, of the kingdom, or their deputy or deputies, unapplied; and it will be for your Majesty's service, and for the ease of your faithful subjects in this kingdom, that so much thereof as can be conveniently spared should be paid, agreeably to your Majesty's most gracious intention, in discharge of part of the national debt," &c. &c. On the transmission of this bill to England, it was affirmed, by the warm partizans of prerogative in the Council, that the Commons of Ireland had no right to apply any part of the unappropriated revenue, nor even to take into consideration the propriety of such appropriation, without the previous consent of the Crown, formally and explicitly declared. In the ensuing Session of Parliament therefore, A. D. 1751, the Duke of Dorset, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, informed the two Houses of Parliament, in his speech from the throne, that he was commanded by the King to acquaint them, that his Majesty, ever attentive to the ease and happiness of his subjects, would graciously consent and recommended it to them, that such a part of the money then remaining in his treasury as should be thought consistent with the public services, be applied towards the farther reduction duction of the national debt. The Commons of Ireland, astonished at this procedure of the Court, and tremblingly alive in a case which so nearly concerned their privileges, omitted, in their address of thanks, all mention of his Majesty's consent, and only acknowledged his gracious attention to their ease and happiness, in recommending to them the application of the surplus. And in the subsequent bill framed for this purpose, in which one hundred and twenty thousand pounds was appropriated to the discharge of the public debt, the same omission was observable. The Ministers in England, highly offended with this contumacious conduct, returned the bill with an alteration in the preamble, signifying his Majesty's consent as well as approbation. And the Irish House of Commons, unwilling to risk the consequences of a serious rupture, passed the bill without farther notice. So far had the misunderstanding between the Crown and Parliament of Ireland proceeded previous to the death of Mr. Pelham, and thus might it have for ever rested, had not the evil genius of the present Minister suggested the necessity of supporting the honor of government, by positive directions to the Duke of Dorset, in opening the Session of the present year, to repeat the expression of his Majesty's gracious consent, in mentioning the surplus of the public money. The House, in their address, not only again omitted the obnoxious word word consent, but the former expressions of grateful acknowledgement: And the bill of appropriation was transmitted to England, entirely divested of the usual complimentary preamble, which the Ministers of the Crown in England, in their great wisdom, thought fit thus to supply—"And your Majesty, ever attentive to the ease and happiness of your faithful subjects, has been graciously pleased to signify that you would consent, and to recommend it to us that so much of the money remaining in your Majesty's treasury as should be necessary, be applied to the discharge of the national debt, or such part thereof as should be thought expedient by Parliament." On the return of the bill, the whole nation seemed animated by the spirit of resistance, and, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the Court, the bill, thus amended, was thrown out by a majority of five voices, and the victory of the opposition was celebrated by universal rejoicings. In revenge, all those who voted against the bill holding public employments were immediately dismissed. But the rejection of the bill occasioning a great stagnation in the usual course of circulation, and the clamor of the public rising high against the government, it was thought proper and necessary, by an humiliating concession, to devote the surplus to the discharge of the debt in virtue of a royal letter. Thus was the dignity of government, which ought never to be lightly or capricapriciously committed, most sensibly wounded. Ireland was taught to know her own strength and importance, and the first symptoms of that high and haughty spirit of independence were now discernible, which have since produced such mighty effects.

If England, at this period, exhibited, by the clamorous opposition of almost all ranks of people to the Jew bill, plain indications that the spirit of fanaticism was by no means extinguished in the nation, the same spirit operated, at the same time, in France, in a manner much more serious and alarming. Under a delusive veil of festivity, pomp, and splendor, the Court of Versailles, during the whole of the reign of Louis XIV. and particularly the latter years of it, concealed a most unrelenting and sanguinary spirit of bigotry and persecution. This spirit displayed itself not merely in the savage folly of that policy by which he attempted the extirpation of the Protestants, but also in his treatment of such of the Catholics themselves as presumed, in any respect, to deviate from the established dogmas of the Romish church. About the middle of the last century, a very celebrated treatise, under the title of Augustinus, had been written by Cornelius Jansen, Bishop of Ypres, on the abstruse theological topics of grace, predestination, and free will, in which he explains those tenets in a mode different from that usually adopted and maintained maintained in the schools, but perfectly consonant, as this reverend and learned Prelate alleged, to the divine and apostolic doctrine of the great St. Austin. As this novel, and therefore rash explication, however, very nearly accorded with that of Calvin and the other leading reformers of the Protestant churches, it excited great alarm and indignation; and the book was repeatedly censured, at different and distant intervals of time, by the intervention and authority of the Papal chair. Nevertheless, the partizans and admirers of this famous treatise, who were now distinguished by the name of Jansenists, seemed continually to increase; and it was at length thought necessary, by a bull issued by Pope Clement XI. at the beginning of the present century, with all the terrific accompaniments of pontifical authority, solemnly to declare, "that all the faithful ought to condemn as heretical, not only with their mouths, but in their hearts," certain specified propositions extracted from the book of Jansenius. This constitution was received by the Gallican church, and promulgated by the King's command and authority. But this bull, far from terminating, only aggravated and inflamed the dispute; and converted it from a theological to a political controversy. The Clergy in general, and more especially the Jesuits, were eager and zealous in their efforts to support the dignity of the Romish See, and to enforce the acceptance of the Papal bull.

bull. On the other hand, the Parliaments of the kingdom, and particularly the Parliament of Paris, embraced every opportunity to express their contempt and hatred of the bull and its partizans. The Archbishop of Paris, a haughty and turbulent Prelate, stood forth at this period as the champion of the Church, and encouraged and commanded the Clergy to deny the sacraments in articulo mortis to all persons refusing to subscribe the bull UNIGENITUS*. Divers ecclesiastics adhering to this injunction, were apprehended by authority of the Parliament, for their contumacious and illegal conduct. Severe censures were passed upon the Archbishop, and a prosecution actually commenced against the Bishop of Orleans; when a mandate from the Court was issued, prohibiting all farther proceedings in these matters. The Parliament, in return, presented a spirited remonstrance to the throne, declaring it to be their indispensable duty and privilege to denounce and execute judgment on all delinquents. And, on the renewal of the royal command, they framed new remonstrances, to which the King refused to reply, referring them to his former peremptory declaration. Upon which the Parliament resolved "that the different chambers should remain assembled, but that all business should be suspended while, by the practices of evil-minded persons, truth was prevented from reaching the throne." Another mandate was now issued, ordering the Parliament to revoke this resolution, on pain of the King's high displeasure; instead of which, a second resolution was passed, that they could not comply with this injunction without violating their duty and their oath. Upon which, lettres de cachet were immediately issued, and the Members of the Parliament banished to distant parts of the kingdom: And a royal chamber was instituted for the intermediate administration of public justice. The letters patent for the establishment of this court were, however, according to the laws and customs of the kingdom, not valid till they were judicially enregistered; and the Parliament of Paris being now no more, application was made to the inferior court of the Chatelet, which declared its absolute incompetency for that purpose: And the Lieutenant Civile appearing in the court in order to enforce the registry, all the Counsellors rose up and retired, leaving on the table an arret, containing their protest against these proceedings: In consequence of which, several of the most respectable and spirited members of this court were committed to the Bastile. The nation at large was now in the highest degree inflamed and exasperated at the despotic conduct of the Court. The provincial Parliaments presented bold remonstrances to the throne, justificatory of the Par-

* By this appellation the bull was universally known, the term Unigenitus being the first word contained in it.

Parliament of Paris. The prosecutions of the contumacious priests were every-where continued, and things seemed evidently tending to open and general revolt, when the Court thought proper to avert the storm by a recal of the Parliament, who publicly re-entered Paris amidst the loudest acclamations of the people. And the Archbishop persisting in his former exhortations and directions to the Clergy, was sent as an exile to Conflans-sous-Charenton. But the wound occasioned by this dissension between the Court and Parliament was never radically healed; and the King, after the lapse of about two years, not only recalled the Archbishop, but received, with decided marks of royal approbation, a bull from the Roman Pontiff, in which those who rejected the bull Unigenitus were piously consigned to everlasting damnation, and the reiterated refusal of the sacraments confirmed by the authoritative sanction of the Holy See. The Parliament of Paris regarding this bull as a direct attack upon the rights of the Gallican church and nation, issued an arret for its suppression; upon which fresh contests arose, but the Parliament remained firm, and the Court was finally compelled to desist from those claims and pretensions, which it had so unwisely and unseasonably agitated. This memorable struggle made a mighty and lasting impression upon the minds of the people. The popularity of the Monarch, formerly distinguished by the flattering appellation of Le bien-aimé, was forever departed. New and interesting ideas began to revolve in the public mind. The origin of the controversy was, in the progress of it, forgotten; and the recal of the Parliament was not the triumph of Jansenism, but of Liberty. The despotic acts of the Court were regarded by the nation with emotions of horror. Various publications, by writers of the highest talents, successively appeared, in which the principles of just and equitable government were explained and illustrated with irresistible force and energy; the boldest speculations were indulged; prejudices, the most deeply rooted, were successfully assailed; an eager and ardent spirit of research was excited; touched by the wand of philosophy, the mighty talisman by which the nation had been fast bound in the sleep of a thousand years, was suddenly dissolved; reason began to resume her empire, and an internal revolution now commenced—a revolution of the mind, which was pre-ordained, in the gradual and regular progression of events, to produce an external revolution unparalleled for the magnitude of its object, and the extent of its consequences, in the annals of mankind. But, alas! no unmixed good has ever yet been the lot of mortals; and experience too clearly evinces that truths of the highest moral and political importance, when first suggested to men long bowed down by the iron hand of oppression, and

and newly awakened to a sense of their own rights, are as flashes of lightning which irradiate the gloom with a pale, terrific, and dangerous lustre.

The political contentions, however, which at this period arose between the kingdoms of Great Britain and France, and which terminated in a long and bloody war, seemed, for some years, to absorb all internal and domestic commotion; and the resources of both nations were exhausted in a contest which a very small portion of wisdom, had they been really and mutually disposed to conciliation, might have sufficed to accommodate. After the cession of Nova Scotia by the treaty of Utrecht, the British Colonies in North America extended along the western shore of the Atlantic for near a thousand miles, and, according to the tenor of the charters granted to the original settlers, the dominion of the soil was bounded only by the Pacific Ocean on the opposite side of the Continent. Spain, in whom were vested the rights attached to the first discovery, advanced claims no less extravagant, and regarded as unwarrantable usurpations the successive settlements of the English nation. France, which held in contempt the pretensions both of England and Spain, established, at a more recent period, colonies on the river St. Laurence to the north, and on the Mississippi to the south, of the English settlements: And a systematic and artfully concerted plan was formed to connect nect these widely-distant establishments by the gradual erection of a chain of fortresses from the lakes Erie and Ontario, along and beyond the Ohio to the embouchure of the Mississippi. To the rich and immense plains extending on both sides of that vast river they gave the appellation of Louisiana; and they contended, that the English Colonies were of right bounded by the range of high lands which ran parallel to the coast, at the distance of one hundred and fifty, or two hundred miles, under the different names of the Apalachian, Alleghaheny, or Blue Mountains. The province of Nova Scotia being ceded to England, according to the ancient limits of that territory, fruitless and endless altercations arose, as to the import of this expression, between the Commissioners of the two nations, to whom the right of fixing the boundaries of the rival empires was assigned; the English claiming the whole territory as far as the southern bank of the river St. Laurence, and the French admitting their right only to the peninsula of Acadie. Another very serious cause of dispute originated in a royal charter inconsiderately and injuriously granted to certain merchants and adventurers of the city of London, who assumed the title of the Ohio Company, of a large tract of ground situated on the banks of the Ohio, with an exclusive privilege of commerce with the Indian tribes inhabiting those regions. This extraordinary grant excited extreme disgust in the minds of the Virginian and Pennsylvanian traders, who saw themselves deprived of a lucrative branch of traffic, and the highest alarm amongst the Indian nations, who perceived with astonishment their lands measured and parcelled out by English surveyors, as if they, who were the actual occupants, had neither interest nor property in them. And M. du Quesne, Governor of Canada, declared that he would suffer no encroachments or depredations to be made on the Indian tribes under the protection of the Crown of France. Towards the latter end of the year 1753, Major Washington, since so famous under the name of General Washington, was deputed by the government of Virginia to the French Commandant on the Ohio, to demand by what authority fortresses were erected, and settlements made, on the territories of the King of Great-Britain; and to require him immediately to desist from the prosecution of designs carried on in open violation of the treaties subsisting between the two Crowns, and totally subversive of the harmony and good understanding which his Britannic Majesty was desirous to maintain and cultivate with the Most-Christian King. To this peremptory requisition, which almost assumed the air and tone of a menace, the French Officer replied with equal spirit, that it was not his province to specify the evidence, and demonstrate the right of the King his Sovereign to the lands situated on the river Ohio; but that he would transmit his message to the Marquis du Quesne, his immediate superior. In the mean time, he declared his total disregard of the summons of the English Governor, and holding his command by virtue of a commission from his General, he was prepared and determined to maintain the rights, and to fulfil the duties, of his station. A far more serious remonstrance was, about the same time, presented by the Earl of Albemarle, the English Ambassador at Paris, to the Court of Versailles, in which the various causes of complaint on the part of England were stated in very strong language. It was declared that, while the Commissaries of the two nations were engaged in adjusting the limits of the two empires, the French had taken actual possession of the territories in dispute; that they had incited the Indians of Nova Scotia and the French inhabitants of Acadie to rise in arms against the English government, and had assisted them with vessels and military stores; that acts of violence had been repeatedly exercised by the authority or countenance of the French Governors against the subjects of Great Britain; and numerous fortresses erected with a view to defend their continual and manifest encroachments on the territories of his Britannic Majesty: And his Excellency concluded with demanding the erasure of the forts, the restitution of the persons and properties properties of all those who had been captured, and an unequivocal assurance that effectual care should be taken, by the most positive instructions to the French Commandants in America, to prevent any similar causes of complaint in future. The French Court not being yet prepared, or not having yet resolved to risk an open rupture with Great Britain, replied to this memorial in terms civilly evasive, and engaged that inquiries should be made, and instructions transmitted to America to obviate all misunderstanding; and several British subjects, traders and others, seized by the French on various pretences, were actually dismissed.

disgust

On the last day of May 1754, the Parliament, newly elected, was opened by commission, and, in the speech delivered by the Lord Chancellor, the two Houses were informed, that his Majesty did not at that time think it necessary to call their attention to the general state of the nation, reserving all discussions of this nature to the usual time of their assembling in the winter; and, on the fifth of June, the Lords Commissioners prorogued the Parliament. Notwithstanding this apparent indifference, the Court of London confiding little in the specious and artful professions of the Court of Versailles, issued orders to the English Governors in America to repel force by force, and to take effectual measures to dislodge the French from their settlements on the Ohio, where they still continued their hostilities and encroachments. A congress being appointed at Albany, consisting of Commissioners from the different colonies, to which the chieftains of the Indian nations bordering on the Ohio were invited, it soon appeared, though they refused not to accept the offered and customary presents, that they were entirely attached to the French interests—a predilection indeed easy to be accounted for by the superior humanity and justice displayed in every part of the conduct of the French nation in their transactions with the ancient inhabitants of the Continent, compared with the violent and imperious deportment of the English. At this meeting, it was determined that Major Washington, who had already distinguished himself by his gallantry and spirit, should be detached with a corps of four hundred men, in order to occupy a post on the Ohio, where he threw up works, and began the erection of a fort, in expectation of speedy and effectual reinforcements; but before the intended succours could arrive, this officer was suddenly attacked by a much superior force of French and Indians, commanded by M. de Viller, who, after in vain summoning Major Washington to surrender, marched to the attack of the fort, yet incomplete, and ill prepared for an assault, which was nevertheless sustained with great vigor; but the English garrison were at length compelled to a capitulation, and they were allowed to retreat, not unmolested indeed by the irregular attacks of the savages, to the province of Virginia. This event, as soon as the intelligence arrived in Europe, was stated, in a memorial of the Earl of Albemarle, as an open violation of the peace. But the Court of Versailles, no longer solicitous to keep any measures with England, treated all remonstrances with disregard; and sent large reinforcements of men, and supplies of military stores, to Quebec, with a manifest determination to pursue and defend her ambitious projects.
I their

not

The Parliament of England met in November, but a profound silence respecting the present critical situation of affairs was observed on the part of the Crown, till, in the month of March (1755), a message was delivered from the King to the Parliament by Sir Thomas Robinson, Secretary of State, importing that "his Majesty having, at the commencement of the Session, declared it to be the principal object of his solicitude to preserve the public tranquillity, and to protect those possessions which constitute a primary source of the public prosperity, now found it necessary to acquaint the House of Commons, that the present state of affairs made it requisite to augment his forces by sea and land, and to take such other measures as might best tend to preserve the peace of Europe, and to secure the just rights of his crown in America." This message produced a warm and affectionate address, dress, and the sum of one million was instantly voted for the purposes specified by his Majesty. While M. de Mirepoix, the French Ambassador in London, still continued to amuse the British Ministry with empty professions of peace and amity, certain intelligence was received that a powerful armament was preparing in the ports of Rochefort and Brest, destined for America; and Admiral Boscawen was immediately appointed to the command of an equal force, fitted out for the avowed purpose of intercepting them. On which M. de Mirepoix declared, that the King his master would consider the first gun fired at sea as a declaration of war. The British Admiral, hoping to obstruct the passage of the French fleet into the gulph of St. Laurence, took his station off the banks of Newfoundland; but, under cover of the thick fogs which so commonly prevail in those northern latitudes, the French Commander eluded his vigilance; two ships of the line only, the Alcide and Lys, being by some accident separated from the rest, fell into the hands of the English. Upon the arrival of this intelligence at Paris, the Duc de Mirepoix was immediately recalled from London, and M. de Buffly from Hanover—the King of England being now resident in that city. Letters of general reprisal were issued by the English Court at this period, as well in Europe as America, and three hundred merchant ships, for the most part unful-

unfuspicious of danger, fell, in the course of the year, into the hands of the English, with not less than eight thousand sailors on board. The French vehemently exclaimed against the conduct of the English government as inconsistent with the law of nations, war not having been as yet formally proclaimed; but the English insisted that the French themselves being clearly the aggressors, it was just and lawful to repel force by force, and that the omission of a form was wholly immaterial. Early in the year 1755, General Braddock had sailed from Cork with a considerable body of regular troops, and, on his arrival in Virginia, took upon him the command of the forces destined to act against the French on the Ohio. This officer was a man of approved bravery, completely versed in all points of military discipline, but opinionated and positive in his temper, and in his deportment austere and imperious. Wholly unacquainted with the country in which he was appointed to the chief command, and entertaining a sovereign contempt for the colonial militia, of whom his army was in a great measure composed, he heard with silent disdain all that information which the provincial officers were desirous to offer respecting the mode of conducting an American expedition through woods, deserts, and morasses, and the precautions which were necessary to guard against surprise, particularly as the Indian nations were
for

for the most part in alliance with France. Having advanced with the most fearless security to less than ten miles of Fort Du Quesne, and without condescending, though earnestly pressed, to employ the irregulars in the service as an advanced guard, or to send out any parties to reconnoitre the country, about noon on the ninth of July, in his march through a pathless swamp, entangled amid brakes and rushes, he was on the sudden saluted with the horrid sound of the Indian war-whoop, accompanied by a general fire both on his front and flank from a concealed and invisible enemy. The vanguard immediately fell back, and terror and confusion soon spread throughout all the ranks of the army. The General, far from making any efforts to discover and disperse this dangerous ambuscade, exerted himself only to re-form and rally his troops, as if engaged with a regular army in an open plain. But the exactest discipline was, in this situation, of little avail; for, though no enemy appeared, the havock and slaughter still continued, and the General himself being at length killed by a musquet shot, the regular troops fled the field with the utmost precipitation—the provincials, so much despised, forming in the rear, and covering their retreat. All the artillery, ammunition, and baggage of the army were left in the hands of the enemy, and even the General's own cabinet, with all his letters and instructions; and the whole conduct duct of this expedition plainly proved that personal courage, though an indispensable requisite, is only a secondary qualification in the character of a military Commander. Very indifferent success also attended the operations carried on in the more northerly parts of the Continent. On the death of General Braddock, the chief command devolved upon General Shirley, who formed a plan for the reduction of the important fortresses of Crown Point and Niagara, erected by the French on the banks of the lakes Champlain and Ontario. The expedition against the former was conducted by General, afterwards Sir William Johnson, a native of Ireland, but long resident in America, where he had acquired great and deserved popularity. From various causes of delay, the troops destined for this service arrived at the place of rendezvous late in the summer; and were, soon after the commencement of their march, attacked in their camp by Baron Dieskau, the French Commander, with great bravery, who was, notwithstanding, repulsed with great loss—the Baron himself being made a prisoner. General Johnson, however, found himself, after this bloody encounter, too much weakened to proceed in his expedition; and, after some deliberation, he determined upon a retreat to Albany. General Shirley himself undertook the conduct of the enterprise against Niagara, which, from its position, commands the communication between

between the lakes Erie and Ontario. But on his arrival at Oswego, a fort belonging to the English on the south-eastern shore of lake Ontario, he deemed it necessary to leave a very large proportion of the troops under his command for the defence of this post; and, after waiting till the end of September for his expected reinforcements and supplies of provisions and stores, he was informed that it would be attended with danger to cross the lake at this advanced season of the year. He therefore determined to defer the siege of Niagara to the next campaign; and set out in October on his return Albany. The Earl of Loudon, an officer of reputation and merit, was now appointed Commander in Chief of the British forces in America, and vested with very extensive powers. But this Nobleman, from causes not easy to develop, did not embark from England till the latter end of May; and, on reaching the head-quarters at Albany June 29 (1756), he found all military operations in a manner suspended, in the expectation of his arrival; after which, a considerable time elapsed in debates and consultations respecting the plan most proper to be adopted, and whether the efforts of the army now assembled should be directed against Crown Point and Ticonderago, situated at the southern extremity of lake Champlain; whether a second attempt should be made against Niagara; or whether an expedition should be undertaken against

against Fort Du Quesne on the Ohio. In the midst of these deliberations, intelligence arrived that the French, under M. de Montcalm, had made themselves masters of Oswego, although strongly garrisoned, plentifully provided with all kinds of warlike stores, and defended by one hundred and twenty pieces of artillery. Apparently discouraged and disconcerted by this unfortunate event, it was determined not to risk any offensive operation during the remainder of the present season, but to employ the autumnal and winter months in making preparations for an early and vigorous campaign the ensuing year. Notwithstanding the former disappointments, high and sanguine hopes were entertained from the great military force collected in the spring of 1757, and the avowed purpose of the Commander in Chief to employ his whole strength in some grand and decisive operation. Admiral Holbourne arrived at Halifax with a powerful squadron, and large reinforcements of troops, in the beginning of July; and the Earl of Loudon, directing his march northward, an invasion of Canada, with their united forces, was reasonably to be expected. At length, however, Louisburg, in the island of Cape Breton, was declared to be the object in contemplation—a scheme very favorable to the views and interests of France at this period, as it left M. de Montcalm entirely at liberty to prosecute his plans of conquest, and Louisburg was so strongly defended, that little apprehension was entertained for its safety. And the British Commanders receiving certain intelligence, after the whole of the military and naval force destined for this expedition had rendezvoused at Halifax, that the garrison of Louisburg consisted of six thousand regular troops, exclusive of provincials, and that seventeen line-of-battle ships were moored in the harbor, it was resolved, according to the custom of this war, to postpone the expedition to a more convenient opportunity. In the mean time, the Marquis de Montcalm had taken advantage of the absence of the Earl of Loudon to lay siege, with an army of ten thousand men, to the important post of Fort William Henry, situated on the southern shore of lake George. The garrison consisted of three thousand men, the fortifications were strong and in good condition, and General Webb, with about four thousand men, was posted in the vicinity, in order to maintain a communication with it. Notwithstanding which, so vigorously were the approaches of the French Commander urged, that articles of capitulation were signed in six days, not only importing the entire surrender of the fort, artillery, and stores, but restraining the garrison from serving against his Most Christian Majesty, or his allies, for the space of eighteen months. By this conquest, the French acquired the entire command of the extensive and magnificent chain of lakes lakes which connects the two great rivers St. Lawrence and Mississippi, and which forms a grand line both of communication and division between the northern and southern parts of this vast Continent. And thus disgracefully terminated the third campaign of the American war, in which the French, with a very inferior force, had maintained an uniform superiority, and in the course of which no advantage had been gained by the English, excepting, indeed, the expulsion of the French from Nova Scotia, by the vigorous exertions of Colonel Monckton, assisted by a body of provincials, expressly voted and detached by the Assembly of Massachusetts for this important purpose. Nor were the operations of the war at this period more skilfully or prosperously conducted by the English nation in Europe than in America. The Court of Versailles, finding a rupture with England inevitable, had employed earnest solicitations with the Court of Madrid to take an active part in her favor. Her efforts, however, were in vain, though supported by all the influence of the Queen-Mother and the Marquis de la Ensenada, the Prime Minister. The King of Spain himself was not disposed to interrupt the harmony which subsisted between Spain and Great Britain; and Don Ricardo Wall, a Spaniard of British extraction, and formerly resident at the British Court, and who possessed great credit with the King, took all imaginable pains to confirm his Majesty in these favorable sentiments: And the intrigues of the Minister with the Court of Versailles being discovered, he was divested of his offices, which were immediately conferred upon his competitor Don Ricardo. The Court of Madrid, however, offered her mediation to compose the differences between England and France; but France insisting upon a suspension of arms in America as the preliminary condition of a negotiation, and England refusing to assent to any such preliminary, nothing could be effected. And the Courts of London and Versailles foreseeing a violent and long-protracted conflict, were assiduously engaged in forming and cultivating alliances in the different Courts of Europe, in order to strengthen their respective interests. A treaty was signed by the King of England, when at Hanover, June 25 (1755), with the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, by which his Serene Highness engaged to hold in readiness for his Majesty's service a body of twelve thousand men. But Saxony and Bavaria, notwithstanding the subsidies which they had regularly received during the years of peace, in contemplation and as the earnest of future services, now entered into opposite connections—laughing, no doubt, at the credulity of the English nation, in supposing honor and gratitude to be ties obligatory upon Princes. In September, a treaty was signed at the palace of Kensington between his Britannic Majesty and the Empress

Empress of Russia, by which that Princess stipulated to maintain, on the frontiers of Livonia, an army of forty thousand infantry, and fifteen thousand cavalry, and a naval force of fifty gallies, to be in immediate readiness to act at the requisition of the King of England, should the electoral dominions of that Monarch be invaded in consequence of the connection of Hanover with Great Britain; for which an annual subsidy of five hundred thousand pounds was to be advanced to the Czarina. The Court of Berlin was, at this crisis, strongly assailed by the Courts of London and Versailles, each flattering itself with a decision in its favor. But the Prussian Monarch, knowing the engagements already contracted between England and Russia, and the strict amity subsisting between the Imperial Courts of Vienna and Petersburg, would not venture to draw upon himself the resentment of these three formidable powers, by a renewal of the alliance with France; and, in January 1756, a treaty was signed at London between the Kings of Great Britain and Prussia, by which they engaged to oppose the introduction of any foreign troops into the Empire. This article, though immediately pointed against France, amounted to a virtual renunciation of the alliance with Russia; and the Czarina resenting the conduct of the King of Great Britain, and exasperated, from causes of a personal as well as political nature, against the King of Prussia, began to listen with attention, or rather with eagerness, to the overtures of France, hitherto so much the object of her jealousy and aversion. "The Empress Elizabeth, says the King of Prussia, who had ever been at enmity with France, rather chose to enter into a league with her, than to preserve the shadow of union with a power which had Prussia for an ally." The Court of Versailles, astonished and alarmed at the defection of Prussia, which, as the King himself tells us, seemed to be considered in France almost in the light of a revolt*, now directed its attention to the Court of Vienna; which, since the termination of the late war, had given clear and repeated intimations of a desire to enter into bonds of permanent amity with France: And, to the amazement of Europe, a treaty of mutual guarantee and support was concluded and signed at Versailles, May 1756, by these two great rival powers; and the inveterate hereditary animosity subsisting for ages between the Houses of Bourbon and Austria, in consequence of which, oceans of blood had been shed, and the fairest countries of Christendom desolated, was at length, if the professions of Princes could merit any serious regard, for ever terminated. These professions were indeed, in this instance unusually sincere. The ruling passion of France was, at this period, the depression of the power of England—and of Austria, the subversion of that of Prussia, which had so recently aspired to a station in the first rank of European powers, and presumptuously established an unheard-of rivalry in the bosom of the Empire itself to the Imperial family. When an union between England and Prussia therefore took place, that repulsive force by which the Houses of Bourbon and Austria had been so long sundered, was instantly changed to a political attraction, naturally leading to a strict and intimate adhesion. The general conduct of France left scarcely a doubt of her intention to take advantage of the political relation of Hanover to Great Britain, by the invasion of that Electorate; although it must be acknowledged, that terms of neutrality were offered to the King of England as Elector of Hanover, which he did not deem it consistent with his honor and dignity to accept. Mighty preparations being made by the French Court, with the avowed design of forming a powerful army in Westphalia, an army of observation, consisting of about forty thousand Hessians, fians, Hanoverians, and Brunswickers, was assembled for the protection of the Electorate: And requisitions were made by the Court of London both at Vienna and the Hague, for the assistance stipulated by treaties. The Empress-Queen at first alleged that, as the contest between England and France related to America only, it was not a casus fœderis, and that Hanover might be secured by a treaty of neutrality. When the war became general, and the application was renewed, she professed that troops could not be spared with safety to her own dominions, which were in danger from the enmity of Prussia. And being again urged after the alliance between England and Prussia was concluded, she declared in plain terms, that, being abandoned by England, she was reduced to the necessity of securing herself by an alliance with France. As to the provinces of the Belgic union, they had scarcely recovered from the terrors of the former war; the public finances were exhausted, and the people in general extremely averse to engage in hostilities. The Court of Versailles, moreover, by a counter-memorial, declared, that, "should the States grant the succors in question, the King of France would consider their compliance as an act of hostility against himself." The application of the English Court, therefore, being perceived, from the operation of these causes, useless and unavailing, Colonel Yorke, the English Ambassador, was directed rected to inform their High Mightinesses, that the King of England would not insist on the requisition; and the States expressed, in grateful terms, their acknowledgements to his Britannic Majesty for thus generously relieving them from their embarrassment.

* "La Cour de Versailles paroissoit croire que le Roi de Prusse étoit à l'égard de la France ce qu'est un despote de Valachie à l'égard de la Porte, c'est à dire, un Prince subordonné et obligé de faire la guerre dès qu'on lui en envoie l'ordre. La nouvelle de cette alliance causa une vive sensation à Versailles dans l'esprit de Louis XV. et de son conseil; peu s'en fallut qu'ils ne dissent que le Roi de Prusse s'étoit revolté contre la France."—Hist. de la Guerre de Sept Ans.

The Parliament of England assembled in November 1755, and, in the opening speech, his Majesty informed the two Houses "that he had adopted what appeared to him the most proper and effectual measures for the protection of the national possessions in America, no reasonable terms of accommodation having been proposed by France; and also to disappoint such designs as, from various appearances and preparations, there was ground to believe had been formed against his kingdoms and dominions; that he had greatly augmented his forces by land and sea; and that he had concluded treaties with Russia and Hesse Cassel, copies of which should be laid before them." In the address moved in both Houses, in answer to this speech, were the following words: "That they looked upon themselves as obliged by the strongest ties of duty, gratitude, and honor, to stand by and support his Majesty in all such wise and necessary measures and engagements, as his Majesty might have taken in vindication of the rights of his Crown, or to defeat any attempts which might be made by France in resentment for such measures, and to assist his Majesty in disappointing or repelling all such enterprises as might be formed not only against his kingdoms, but also against any other of his dominions, though not belonging to the Crown of Great Britain, in case the King should be attacked on account of the part which his Majesty had taken for maintaining the essential interests of his kingdoms." The declaration contained in this clause met with a most vehement and formidable opposition in the House of Commons, not from the powerless party usually voting in opposition, but from Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge, the most popular members of the present administration, and a very considerable number of other Gentlemen possessing posts under the government. Mr. Pitt declared "the whole system and scheme of politics now adopted, to be flagrantly absurd and desperate. It was no other than to gather and combine the powers of the Continent into an alliance of magnitude sufficient to withstand the efforts of France and her adherents against the Electorate of Hanover, at the single expense of Great Britain. The three last wars with France had cost Britain above one hundred and twenty millions of money; the present exhibits a prospect of an effusion of treasure still more enormous: And, when we consider that such immense issues of money are to be supplied by new loans, heaped upon a debt of eighty millions, who will answer for the consequence, or venture to ensure us from a national bankruptcy? Mr. Pitt contended, that a naval war we could and ought to support, but a Continental war, upon this system, we could not. We have suffered ourselves to be deceived by names and sounds; the general cause, the balance of power, the liberty of Europe; and have exhausted our wealth without any rational object. Should Hanover be actually attacked on account of her connection with England, he acknowledged that we ought not to make peace without procuring for its inhabitants ample satisfaction and indemnity. But the idea of defending Hanover by an army of mercenaries, he ridiculed as preposterous and impracticable. This system, he said, would, in a few years, cost us more money than the fee-simple of the Electorate was worth; for it was a place so inconsiderable, that its name was scarcely to be found in the map. He ardently wished to break those fetters which chained us, like Prometheus, to that barren rock." The clause was, however, carried on a division; and the King, in his reply to the address, thanked the two Houses in the strongest terms for this signal proof of their affection to his person and regard for his honor. This transaction was followed by the immediate dismissal of Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge from their respective employments.
and

It must be remarked that, three days before the meeting of Parliament, Sir Thomas Robinson, Secretary cretary of State, from an honest and sincere consciousness of his own incapacity to conduct the business of government in the House of Commons, had resigned the Seals, which were directly transferred to Mr. Fox, Secretary at War, who unquestionably, in respect of political ability, had at this time no rival in the House of Commons, Mr. Pitt only excepted. Though engaged for several years past in the support of the same administration, they were actuated by a very visible jealousy on almost all occasions: And it was observed, that they agreed in nothing so well as in those sentiments of contempt for the late Minister, which they were at little pains to conceal. It may easily be supposed, therefore, that Mr. Pitt, who could endure no superior, was very little delighted with the advancement of his competitor, who seemed as firmly resolved to admit no equal: And Mr. Legge entering entirely into the views of Mr. Pitt, it was imagined that the new Minister would not long be able to maintain his ground against an opposition strengthened by so powerful a secession, founded on professions so popular and patriotic. Mr. Fox however, supported by the favor of the King, the patronage of the Duke of Cumberland, and the undivided interest of the Pelhams, was able to secure a triumphant majority: And the treaties with Russia and Hesse Cassel, though strongly and obstinately opposed, were ratified in a House consisting of four hundred and forty-eight

I
Members,

Members, by three hundred and twenty against one hundred and twenty-eight. This great majority could not, however, disguise the impolicy and imbecility of the conduct of the Premier, who, perplexed by all the fears and jealousies incident to a weak yet aspiring mind, had neither dared, at the demise of Mr. Pelham, to enter into a confidential connection with Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox, the only men in the House of Commons by whom he could be effectually supported, nor entirely to break with them. On his assuming, therefore, the direction of the Treasury, the Seals of his department as Secretary were indeed offered to Mr. Fox, but in a mode and under conditions which Mr. Fox thought too degrading to accept—Mr. Pitt being, at the same time, amused with artificial professions and assurances of regard signifying nothing. On the resignation of Sir Thomas Robinson, whose utter inability to elevate himself into the rank of a rival to the Duke was his grand recommendation to the high office he held, the Seals were given to Mr. Fox on his own terms, and his Grace was reduced to the necessity of soliciting a favor, when he had it in his power to have conferred one*. In the midst of these

* In an official conference between the Duke of Newcastle and Mr. Pitt, his Grace mentioning the American expedition on the Ohio, Mr. Pitt said, "Your Grace knows that I have no capacity for these things; and I do not therefore desire to be informed

these political contentions, intelligence arrived of a disaster which excited the most vivid emotions of grief

informed about them." In the summer of 1755, changes being in contemplation, advances were made to Mr. Pitt; and the Lord Chancellor, on the part of the Duke of Newcastle, told him, "that although the King had taken disagreeable prejudices, and was very fond of Lord Holderness, and Sir Thomas Robinson, in case any accident should take place, if he would assist them cordially, it might perhaps happen, that they might procure the Seals for him, which he so much desired." Mr. Pitt repeating the last words of the Chancellor, asked, "Of whom? He did not remember he had ever applied to his Lordship for them; he was sure he never had to the Duke of Newcastle; and he assured the Chancellor that, if they could prevail upon his Majesty to give them to him under present circumstances, all the use he would make of them would be to lay them at his Majesty's feet. If he asked for any favor, it would be that they should inform his Majesty better. To enable him, or any one else to conduct the business of the nation in the House of Commons, they must give him proper distinction and powers; he said the Duke's system would not do, and, while he had life and breath to utter, he would oppose it. There must be men of efficiency and authority in the House, who should have access to the Crown, habitual, frequent, familiar access, that they might be able to speak and act with effect, to do themselves and their friends justice, and not be the victims of a whisper."

Lord Melcombe.

Some years previous to this period, on occasion of a petition presented to the House of Commons, relative to a contested election for the borough of Seaford, in which the Duke of Newcastle had too grossly and publicly interfered, Mr. Potter, son of Abp. Potter, the successor of Dr. Wake in the metropolitan see of Canterbury, a young man whose talents and accomplishments grief and compassion amongst all ranks and orders of persons throughout the nation. This was no other than the almost total destruction of the city of Lisbon by a tremendous earthquake, on the first of November*. The two principal shocks, which were not of the horizontal, but vorticoso species, continued near a quarter of an hour, and they were immediately followed by a most extraordinary rise and inundation of the Tagus. A vast number of churches, monasteries, and other pub-lishments would have rendered him, could he have relinquished the monstrous ambition "to shine a TULLY and a WILMOT too," the ornament of his country—declared, in the debate which arose, "that, if ever the annals of those times were delivered down to posterity by a faithful historian, he would have a new portrait to draw—of a Minister the most incapable though the most ambitious, the weakest though the most insolent, the most pusillanimous though the most presumptuous." Mr. Pelham, upon this, rose to call to order, saying, "that, though no person had been as yet actually named, this character must be intended for somebody; and cautioning this youthful speaker, if he thought proper to mention any name, to be prepared to prove what he should assert," Mr. Potter replied, "that he was happy to find he had as yet been guilty of no irregularity, and that even the apprehension of it was groundless; for it was not within his intention to mention any individual. He did not think himself so ill a painter as to make it necessary for him to write the names of those to whom his portraits belonged." It would, however, be injustice not to allow the Duke of Newcastle the merit of disinterestedness as to the emoluments of office, and of zeal for the general interests of his country.

* 1755.

lic

lic buildings, and many thousand private houses, were, in the space of a few minutes, thrown down—the earth heaving, rocking, and, in many parts, rending asunder, with incredible noise and violence. And this superb city, after the final cessation of the concussions, presented to the view of the astonished spectator only an heap of ruins. The royal family were compelled to leave the palace with precipitation, and to retire into the neighbouring fields for safety; and ten thousand of the inhabitants, as it was computed, were killed by the fall of the buildings, or swallowed up in the chasms formed by the numerous and horrid dispartings of the earth. A message from the Throne informed the two Houses of this dreadful calamity; and, by an act of generosity and humanity which conferred the highest honor on the Parliament and nation, the sum of one hundred thousand pounds was instantly and unanimously voted for the use of the distressed inhabitants of that metropolis; and supplies to this amount in corn, flour, rice, and other necessaries, were shipped without delay for Portugal, and proved a most welcome and seasonable relief. And his Most Faithful Majesty expressed on this occasion, in terms of the warmest emotion, his grateful acknowledgements to the British Crown and nation. Amidst the millions and millions expended for the purposes of devastation and destruction, a vote of this

this description seems as a paradise blooming in the wild.

Early in the year 1756, Mr. Fox, the new Minister, received a letter from Mr. Rouillé, Secretary of State for foreign affairs in France, expostulating, in the name of his Sovereign, "upon the hostile instructions given by the King of England to General Braddock and Admiral Boscawen, in direct contradiction to the amicable professions of the British Court. He complained of the insult offered to the French flag in the capture of two ships of war, and of the depredations on the French commerce, without any previous declaration of war, in contempt of the law of nations. He demanded therefore, in the name of the King his master, full and entire satisfaction for this atrocious violation of the dignity of his Crown, as well as a complete reparation for the injuries sustained by his people." To this peremptory requisition Mr. Fox replied with firmness and spirit, "that the King of England would willingly consent to an equitable accommodation of differences, but would not comply with the demand of restitution as a preliminary condition, his Britannic Majesty having taken no steps but such as the hostilities previously committed by the French, and a regard to his own honor, and the rights of his Crown and People, rendered just and indispensable." War being now considered on both sides as virtually, though not actually, declared, the French Court issued an order to seize all British vessels in the French harbors, and began with great assiduity to repair the fortifications of Dunkirk. The naval preparations at Brest were prosecuted with unremitting diligence; a vast number of transports were collected in the different ports in the channel, and numerous bodies of land forces were seen moving from all parts towards the coasts of Normandy, Picardy, and Bretagne. About the close of March, the King sent a message to Parliament, stating, "that he had received repeated and authentic advices that a design was actually formed by the French Court for the invasion of Great Britain; that he had taken the proper precautions for putting the kingdom in a posture of defence; that, in order farther to strengthen himself, he had made a requisition of the Hessian troops which the Landgrave had, by the late treaty, agreed to furnish." An address was immediately presented, thanking his Majesty in warm terms for this seasonable and prudent requisition. And, in a few days, Mr. Fox, encouraged by the prevailing unanimity of the House, moved a second address, "beseeching his Majesty that, for the more effectual defence of his kingdoms, and for the better security of the religion and liberties of his subjects, he would be graciously pleased to order twelve battalions of his Electoral troops to be forthwith embarked for England." This also was carried by a very great majority, majority, and, in the course of the ensuing month, these troops actually arrived. Such was the consternation excited throughout the kingdom by the idea of an invasion, that these measures of the Minister were received with great and general applause; though it appeared, in the view of Europe at large, not less unaccountable than disgraceful, that England should, at the commencement of a foreign war, deem herself unequal to provide for her own internal safety; and should have recourse to the aid of foreign mercenaries for the protection of her laws and liberties, when none of the natural means of defence were wanting, when her naval force was confessedly far superior to that of the enemy, and her armies were not engaged, as formerly, in fighting Quixotic battles on the Continent *. At the close of the Session, the Speaker, Mr. Onslow, on presenting the money-bills for the royal assent, addressed the King in a speech replete with sentiments so just and constitutional, expressed in language so bold and animated, as to merit the most distinguished regard. After specifying the extent, and remarking the liberality, of the grants, exceeding those of any former period, he declared, "that the COMMONS of ENGLAND hoped the sword, so bravely drawn and so effectually supported, would be intrusted only in capable and honest hands: And that the naval strength of Great Britain will do service as much greater as it is exalted higher than ever before. His Majesty's faithful Commons apprehended that the present critical juncture convinces that alliances on the Continent, as they are unnatural, so they must ever be prejudicial to the true interest of England; that there is no gratitude to be expected from, no dependence to be placed on, such allies, who, supported as they have been, by the blood and treasure of this kingdom, have taken the opportunity of the first prospect of present profit to break through every tie. Not discouraged, however, by the ingratitude of allies, or the ambition of enemies, they have with pleasure beheld the sword drawn to vindicate the national honor and interest—proud to let all the world see that England is able to fight her own battles; and to stand by her own natural strength. Though ever attached to his Majesty's person, he declared, nevertheless, that there were circumstances existing at which nothing but their confidence in his Majesty's justice, and love to his people, could hinder them from being most seriously alarmed.

* Les François annoncèrent avec ostentation qu'ils se prépareroient à faire de leur côté une descente en Angleterre. Ils répandirent des troupes le long des côtes de la Bretagne, et de la Normandie: Ils firent construire des bateaux plats pour transporter ces troupes, et assemblèrent quelques vaisseaux à Brest. Ces démonstrations épouvantèrent les Anglois; il y eut des momens où cette nation qui passe pour si sage, se crut perdue. Le Roi George afin de la rassurer eut recours à des troupes Hano-vriennes et Hessoises. Oeuvres de Frederic II. tom. 2.

alarmed. Subsidies to foreign Princes, when already burdened with a debt scarce to be borne, cannot but be severely felt—an army of foreign troops, a thing UNPRECEDENTED, UNHEARD-OF, UNKNOWN, brought into England, cannot but alarm. Still they had reliance upon his Majesty, and hoped that their burdens might be lightened, their fears removed, as soon as possible; and, in the mean time, that the sword of these FOREIGNERS should not be entrusted a MOMENT out of his own hand to any other person whatsoever.” The unanimous approval of the principles and sentiments inculcated in this spirited address reflects certainly great honor on the House, and it is much to be regretted that they should ever have been induced, in practise, to deviate from them. This speech, however, discovers symptoms of democratic resolution, which, had the liberties of the country been openly invaded, would have displayed itself in a manner fatal to ministers, terrible to kings!

Whether the French ever seriously meditated a descent upon the English coast, remains, after all, extremely doubtful; and it appears highly probable, that the preparations which occasioned this universal alarm were designed chiefly, or solely, as a veil to disguise their real design of an attack upon the island of Minorca. And, while the attention of the English Ministry and nation was superfluously occupied with the armaments of Brest and Dunkirk, it seemed entirely to escape their notice, that a formidable fleet was, at the very same time, equipping at Toulon; till at length its destination becoming notorious, a squadron very incompetent to the purposes of the expedition was detached to the Mediterranean, under Admiral Byng, an officer of whom the public knew little more than that he was the son of the gallant and heroic Viscount Torrington. This armament, consisting of ten ships of the line, afterwards joined by two or three others, sailed from Spithead April 7, 1756, and, on the second of May, the Admiral arrived at Gibraltar, where he was informed that the French fleet under M. de la Galissoniere, consisting of thirteen ships of the line and transports, on board of which were embarked fifteen thousand land forces, had sailed from Toulon on the tenth of April, with a view to a descent on the island of Minorca, and were now actually engaged in the siege of Fort St. Philip. On this intelligence, the Admiral transmitted dispatches to England, written in a style of great apparent dejection, "lamenting that he was not sent out in time to prevent the landing of the French; complaining of the bad condition of the ships, and of the total deficiency which he found at Gibraltar of all the necessary requisites for careening and refitting. He signified his opinion of the impracticability of throwing any supply of troops into the fortress, and of the impo-

licy

licy of attempting it, if feasible, as the siege could not be raised without the co-operation of a land-force, and any reinforcement of men would consequently only increase the number of prisoners, which must ultimately fall into the hands of the enemy." This extraordinary letter being considered by the Ministry as a virtual accusation of their negligence or incapacity, and as plainly ominous of the loss of the place, they determined to convince the Admiral that such language was not to be held with impunity. On approaching Minorca, the Admiral descried the British colors still flying at the castle of St. Philip's: And, at the same time, the French fleet appearing to the south-east, he formed the line of battle, and, about two o'clock, threw out signals to bear away two points from the wind and engage. Admiral West, who commanded the van division, perceiving the inconsistency of the two orders, chose to comply with the last, and bore away with his division seven points from the wind, as absolutely necessary to bring the enemy to a close and regular engagement. Finding himself, however, not sustained by his commander, he could not pursue the advantage he had gained without imminent danger of having his communication with the remainder of the fleet entirely cut off. When the Commander was exhorted by his Captain to bear down upon the enemy, in order to support the ships of the van, Admiral Byng coolly replied, that it was his determination to keep the line of battle entire; and that he would avoid the error of Admiral Matthews, who, in his engagement with the combined fleets of France and Spain off Toulon, had broke the line by his precipitation, and had exposed himself by his rashness to a fire which he could not sustain. Under color, therefore, of preserving the line of battle entire, in order to fight with the more advantage, it could scarcely be affirmed that he fought at all—the distance at which he engaged being so great that he received only some few shots in his hull, and not a single man was killed or wounded on board the Admiral's own ship, a noble second-rate of ninety guns. M. de la Galiffoniere was well pleased to perceive the British Commander so little in earnest, and, having no urgent reasons on his part to wish for a continuance of the fight, he bore away under an easy sail towards evening; and, though the British Admiral made the signal for chasing, it so happened that the French were not overtaken, and, next morning, they were entirely out of sight. On inquiry into the condition of the fleet after this engagement, it was found, that three of the principal ships were so much damaged in their masts that they could not keep the sea with safety, that about two hundred men were killed and wounded in the engagement, and many others disabled by sickness. The Admiral represented sented to a council of war, held on the occasion, that his Squadron was much inferior to the enemy in weight of metal and number of men; and that they had also the advantage of sending their sick and wounded to Minorca, from whence they received continual supplies and reinforcements; that, in his opinion, it was impracticable to relieve the castle of St. Philip, and that they ought, therefore, to make the best of their way back to Gibraltar, to refit, and wait for farther orders from England. The despondency of a Commander is ever contagious; and, though no effort whatever had been made to accomplish the object of their destination, the council concurred unanimously in these sentiments, and the fleet immediately set sail for Gibraltar, the French returning to their former station off Mahon.

When the official dispatches of the Admiral arrived in England, the Ministry, fully prepared for intelligence of this nature, and presuming that the sequel of the history would correspond with the prelude, commissioned, without delay, Admirals Hawke and Saunders to take the command in the Mediterranean; and, at the same time, orders were given to send home Admiral Byng in arrest; and, on his arrival in England, he was committed close prisoner to Greenwich hospital.

Notwithstanding that the garrison of St. Philip had reason to consider themselves as abandoned to their fate, a very gallant defence was made by General neral Blakeney, the Governor, from the middle of April to the beginning of July, when no intelligence being received from England, and no prospect of relief discernible, the works, and even the body of the castle being much shattered, the embrasures and parapets demolished, many cannon dismounted, and a lodgment actually made by the enemy on one of the principal redoubts, the garrison also being exhausted with hard and incessant duty, it was resolved to beat the chamade, and a very favorable capitulation was granted by the Duc de Richelieu, the French Commander, the garrison being permitted to march out with all the honors of war, and with the liberty of a free and unmolested conveyance to Gibraltar. In a few days after the surrender of the island, Admiral Hawke appeared in view, with a fleet much superior to that of the French; but M. de la Galissoniere had seasonably retired: And the English Admiral seeing the French colors flying on the castle of St. Philip, this gallant officer found every effort precluded; and indeed, had he arrived previous to the surrender, there was little probability of his being able, even by an absolute defeat of the French squadron, to effect its relief.

This conquest was celebrated in France with great triumph and rejoicings; while, in England, it produced a degree of depression much more than proportionate to the real magnitude and importance of the loss sustained. This depression was accompanied with a prevailing emotion of resentment, and even of rage, against the unfortunate Admiral Byng, which could scarcely have been exceeded had he, by his criminal misconduct, sacrificed half the navy of Great Britain. In the ensuing Session of Parliament, an inquiry was instituted in the House of Commons into the causes of the loss of the island of Minorca; and the House having addressed his Majesty for copies of all letters and instructions relative to this subject, such a prodigious mass of papers was produced as seemed rather calculated to overwhelm and stifle, than to explain and elucidate the object of this investigation. After a loose and cursory examination of these documents, which it would have been the business of a Session to methodise and digest, the House resolved, “ 1. That, from the intelligence repeatedly received by his Majesty’s Ministers, there was just reason to believe that an invasion of Great Britain or Ireland was actually intended by the French King; and, 2. That no greater number of ships of war could, with safety to his Majesty’s dominions and the interest of his subjects, be sent to the Mediterranean than were actually sent thither under the command of Admiral Byng.” These resolutions were evidently dictated by the spirit of resentment or prejudice, and seemed constructed solely for the exculpation of the Ministers: Though it still appeared absolutely incomprehensible to all impartial impartial censurs that, with more than one hundred and fifty ships of war in commission, so small a force only could be spared for so great a service. It is certain that Mr. Fox was desirous to have detached a strong squadron to the Mediterranean the first week in March, but could not prevail over the fears of the Duke of Newcastle, and the presumption of Lord Anson, who assured him that Byng's squadron would beat any thing that the French had or could have in the Mediterranean. After the loss of the island, the Duke of Newcastle eagerly affirmed to Mr. Fox, "that no blame could rest, or be thought to rest, upon him; that the sea was not his province; and that the nation and the House of Commons were well satisfied with his conduct. Mr. Fox replied, that those who had the chief direction in an administration would bear the greatest share of the blame; and that those people deceived him who told him it was otherwise now. He had, indeed, defended his Grace in the House of Commons in every thing where he could defend him, but in one thing he never could, which was in his not believing it must be war, and in not arming sooner *."
panied

The clamors of the people for justice still continuing, the trial of Admiral Byng commenced December 28, 1756, before a court-martial held on board the ship St. George, in the harbor of Portsmouth. And, after a long investigation of evidence, the Court determined that the Admiral, during the engagement on the twentieth of May last, did not do his utmost endeavor to take, seize, and destroy, the ships of the French King; and that he did not exert his utmost power for the relief of the castle of St. Philip—they, therefore, unanimously agreed, “that he fell under the letter of the twelfth article of the Naval Code, which, for this offence, positively prescribes death, without any alternative left to the discretion of the court. But, believing his misconduct to arise neither from cowardice nor disaffection, they earnestly recommended him as a proper object of mercy.” The Admiral heard his doom pronounced without the least alteration of countenance or feature; and, with a low obeisance to the court, retired in dignified silence. Great interest was made from various quarters to obtain a remission of the sentence, but without effect; and a warrant was issued by the Lords of the Admiralty for the execution of the Admiral on the fourteenth of March 1757. During this interval he remained on board the Monarque in custody of the Marshal of the Admiralty, and was at no time perceived to lose his composure or cheerfulness. About noon on the day appointed, the Admiral having taken the last farewell of his friends, advanced with a firm step and serene aspect from the

* Lord Melcombe.

the great cabin to the quarter-deck, where a guard of marines awaited to execute the sentence; and kneeling, without any pause or delay, on a cushion provided for the purpose, he tied with his own hands a white handkerchief over his eyes, and immediately dropped another as a signal for the executioners, and five balls passed instantly through his body—the whole of this striking scene, from his leaving the cabin, being over, and the Admiral deposited on his bier, in the space of about three minutes. On a general review of this melancholy catastrophe, and of the causes by which it was produced, the fate of Admiral Byng must be pronounced beyond all example severe and rigorous. Destined to execute a commission hopeless and impracticable, or at least not to be effected without the most desperate efforts of courage, he suffered his mind to be too strongly impressed with the difficulties of his situation, and though possessed, probably, of a degree of calm resolution which would have secured his character from imputation upon occasions which required no extraordinary exertion, he was doubtless totally and constitutionally incapable of that heroic and ardent enthusiasm which kindles at the view of danger, which is inflamed with the thirst of glory, and which, if it cannot command success, is at least ambitious to convince the world that it has left nothing untried in order to deserve it. Firmly persuaded that the object of his enterprize was unattainable, this officer appears to have sunk under his accumulated embarrassments, and appeared to his friends perhaps, on a retrospective view of this transaction, to fall as much below the usual level of his character, as it was necessary, in such circumstances, to rise above it. The fortitude of his conduct during the trial, and previous to the execution, sufficiently rescue his memory from the vile and indelible taint of cowardice: And, in a paper which he delivered immediately before his death to the Marshal of the Admiralty, he declares the satisfaction he felt in the consciousness of having faithfully discharged his duty to the utmost of his judgment and ability; and he styles himself, not without some appearance of reason, "a victim destined to divert the indignation and resentment of an injured and deluded people."
object

Notwithstanding the sacrifice of this victim, the nation exhibited symptoms of the highest dissatisfaction at the conduct of the Administration under whose guidance and government nothing but disgraces and disasters had happened. The prospect of a German war for the protection of Hanover was odious to the majority of the people; the defeat of Braddock, and the subsequent losses in America, were the subject of equal astonishment and indignation, and the recent capture of Minorca threw the kingdom into a paroxysm of rage, as the apprehension of an invasion had before done into that that of terror. And though the Ministry, in calling in the assistance of the Hessian and Hanoverian auxiliaries, had acted with the general approbation, and even applause, their conduct, now the danger had passed over, was stigmatized as the effect of a ridiculous and reproachful timidity, if not rather of absolute treachery. It was suggested that the kingdom had been left purposely unprovided, and that the natives of South Britain had been formerly subdued by auxiliaries of the same country, hired, like these, for their defence and protection. And the public suspicion and hatred of these foreign mercenaries rose to such an height, that the modest, orderly, and inoffensive behaviour only, by which they were distinguished, could, we are assured, have secured them from acts of outrage. War had been declared in form by Great Britain against France in May 1756, and, in the following month, by France against Great Britain: And much pains were taken in the manifesto published by the latter, to contrast the moderation and equity of the Court of Versailles with the intemperate violence of the Court of London, and particularly stigmatizing the seizures of the French ships of war and commerce, before a declaration of war, as piracy and perfidy. And it must be acknowledged, that no very solid or satisfactory reason has been assigned for delaying the declaration on the part of England, when hostilities were not only resolved upon but actually commenced. The Duke of Newcastle and Mr. Fox, now at the head of the Administration, finding the tide of popularity and opinion set strongly against them, dreaded with reason the approaching meeting of Parliament, and determined, by a timely resignation, to avert the disgrace and danger attending a compulsive dismissal. In November 1756, Mr. Pitt was appointed principal Secretary of State; Mr. Legge reinstated in his post of Chancellor of the Exchequer, which had been occupied during his secession by Sir George, afterwards Lord Lyttelton; and the Duke of Devonshire was nominated to the high office of First Lord Commissioner of the Treasury. On the second of December, the Session was opened by a very animated speech from the throne, in which his Majesty expressed his confidence "that the union, fortitude, and affection, of his people would, under the guidance of the divine Providence, enable him to surmount every difficulty, and vindicate the dignity of his Crown against the ancient enemy of Great Britain." He declared, that the recent losses in America demanded resolutions of vigor and dispatch: And that he had nothing so much at heart as to remove all grounds of dissatisfaction from his people; for this end, he had remanded the foreign troops which had been brought hither at the desire of Parliament; and recommended the framing of a national militia, relying with pleasure on the spirit and zeal of his people in defence of his person and realm. He took notice of the unnatural union of counsels abroad, threatening the subversion of the Empire, and of the protestant interest on the Continent; concluding with professions of his unwearied care and unceasing endeavors to promote the glory and happiness of his people." Soon after the commencement of the Session, Mr. Pitt, now regarded as first Minister, delivered to the House a message from the King, importing, "that as the formidable preparations, and vindictive designs, of France, were evidently bent against his Majesty's Electoral dominions, and the territories of his good ally the King of Prussia, his Majesty confided in the zeal and affection of his faithful Commons to assist him in forming and maintaining an army of observation for the just and necessary defence of the same, and to enable him to fulfil his engagements with his Prussian Majesty, for the security of the Empire, and the support of their common interests." Notwithstanding the great popularity of the present Administration, sustained by the superior talents and general integrity of the Ministers, there were not wanting those in the House of Commons who forcibly urged the contrast between this recommendation, and the former eloquent reasonings and invectives of the Minister against the whole fatal system of Continental connection; the inexpressible folly and madness of which appeared in the

VOL. II. S spirit

the most striking point of view at the present crisis, when, after all the millions expended, and the legions sacrificed to the preservation of a chimerical balance of power, with which the safety of England was supposed, or pretended, to be connected, we were left destitute of an ally, excepting a Prince so embarrassed in his own affairs, that, far from being able to grant assistance to us, he would certainly need to be supported by us. England, they asserted, was under no obligation, either of interest or duty, to exhaust her treasure and her blood in the defence of Hanover. That Electorate was sufficiently secured in common with the other Electorates, Principalities, and Co-estates, of the Germanic Body, by the Constitutions of the Empire. It was not to be imagined, that the Princes of the Empire, or even that Austria itself, notwithstanding her recent and forced alliance with France, would suffer so formidable a power to acquire a permanent establishment in Germany; that, if any reluctance appeared to engage in the defence of a cause in which they had an immediate and common interest, it arose entirely from the firmness of their persuasion, that the interposition of England would render all interference on their part superfluous. It was boldly affirmed, that the whole of the public debt contracted since the accession of the House of Hanover, was incurred in pursuance of measures totally foreign to the interests of these kingdoms:

And that if Hanover must at all events become the object of the solicitude of Great Britain, it would be infinitely better that France should be allowed to acquire and retain peaceable possession of the Electorate during the continuance of the war, and to indemnify the inhabitants for the losses and sufferings which they might incur at the conclusion of it, than to maintain vast armies at an immense expense for its defence and security, of which, after all, it remained extremely problematic whether we were equal to the accomplishment." The message, nevertheless, was received by the House with loyal approbation, and the supplies granted to the utmost extent demanded by the Minister. It was, however, strongly suspected, that the measure thus coldly recommended, or rather stated to the House, had been previously objected against in the cabinet; and, in a short time, it could no longer be concealed that the new Administration was agitated by a great internal convulsion; and that the favorite project of the King for strengthening the army in Germany with large reinforcements of troops from England was not assented to by the patriot ministers Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge. His Majesty, irritated by the pertinacity of their opposition, at length resolved upon an effort to relieve himself from this unwelcome and imperious control; and, in April 1757, Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge were suddenly dismissed from their offices; the Chancellorship of the Exchequer

Exchequer being consigned, pro tempore, to the Chief Justice of England. And Mr. Fox, again destined to take the lead in affairs, and invested with full and unlimited powers, had made proposals to his former coadjutor, the Duke of Newcastle, to resume his station at the head of the Treasury. But his Grace, doubting the stability of the new arrangement, thought it expedient to demur; and, in the mean time, commenced a secret negotiation with the Ex-Ministers, and, after an interregnum of some weeks agitated by the violence of political conflict and cabal, joined them openly with all his powerful connections. The alarm of the nation at the dismissal of Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge is scarcely conceivable. Numberless addresses from all parts were presented to his Majesty, beseeching him to reinstate these Ministers in their employments. The principal cities and corporations in the kingdom presented them with the freedom of their respective guilds in golden boxes. Party spirit seemed to be extinguished, for all voices, without one dissonant murmur, were now united in their praise. Mr. Fox, perceiving it impossible to stem the torrent, wisely counselled the Monarch to yield, without resistance, to the wishes of the people. And, in June, Mr. Pitt resumed the Seals of Secretary of State, Mr. Legge and the Duke of Newcastle their former stations at the Board of Treasury, Lord Anson was placed at the head of the Admiralty, Sir Robert Henley appointed Keeper of the Great Seal in the room of Lord Hardwicke, and Mr. Fox himself, acceding to the new order of things, was gratified with the lucrative office of Paymaster-General of the army*.

In

* "Public matters, says Lord Chesterfield in a letter to his friend Mr. Dayrolles, February 1757, have been, and are still, too undecypherable for me to understand, consequently to relate. Fox, out of place, taking the lead in the House of Commons, Pitt, Secretary of State, declares that he is no Minister, and has no Ministerial influence. The Duke of Newcastle and Lord Hardwicke lie by and declare themselves for neither party.—April 1757, Our public situation is now, perhaps, more ridiculous and unaccountable than ever. Two posts which were once thought considerable ones, which used to be solicited by many, and wished for by more, I mean those of Secretary of State and Chancellor of the Exchequer, have been proffered about to a degree of profusion, and yet refused. The late possessors of them were most imprudently turned out before the end of the Session, and are thereby become not only the most, but, perhaps, the only two, popular men now in this kingdom.—July 1757, After many negotiations, breakings off, and recomencements, things are at last fixed. About three weeks ago, Fox was in a manner declared Minister, to the exclusion of the Duke of Newcastle and Pitt, and the Seals of the Chancellorship of the Exchequer were to have been given to him the next day. Upon this Holderness resigned; the Duke of Rutland, and some others, declared their intentions of following his example, and many refused the places that were offered them by Fox as the first Minister for those two or three days. Upon these discouragements, Fox went to the King, and told him, that it was impossible for him, in such a situation, to undertake
the

In consequence of this general coalition of parties, all opposition in Parliament seemed annihilated, and Mr. Pitt, to whom the entire direction of the war was now entrusted, had free and full scope to exert his utmost ability in the service of his country. The events, however, which marked the commencement of his administration were by no means fortunate. A formidable armament, equipped with incredible diligence, sailed from the harbor of Portsmouth the beginning of September, consisting of eighteen ships of the line, and a large body of land forces, under the command of Sir Edward Hawke and Sir John Mordaunt. When Mr. Pitt ordered the fleet to be equipped, and appointed the period for its being at the place of rendezvous, Lord Anson said it was impossible to comply with the requisition: But Mr. Pitt, with great warmth, replied, "That it might be done; and, if the ships were not ready at the time specified, he should signify his neglect to the King, and impeach his Lordship in the House of Commons." The menace produced its effect, and, on the twenty-third of the same month, the fleet anchored off the river Charente with a view to attempt the reduction of the city of Rochefort. Many days passed in sounding the river, in reconnoitring the coasts, in the management of affairs. The King hereupon, though very unwillingly, sent for the Duke of Newcastle again, and at last, "after a thousand difficulties, things are as you have seen in the papers,"—Lord Chesterfield's Miscellaneous Works.

removing the troops from the transports to the boats, and the boats to the transports; and in deliberations upon the intent and practicability of the instructions under which they were to act. At length it was concluded to risque an attack upon the isle of Aix, situated in the mouth of the Charente, and defended by a small fort and garrison; and this service, equal in importance to that of picking up shells on the shore, being performed, and the works demolished, a council of war was held, in which it was resolved, agreeably to that spirit of quietism by which it has been observed that councils of war are in general distinguished *, to return without delay to England. Great expectations having been entertained of the event of this expedition, the nation was proportionably disappointed, and enraged at its failure: And the public censure was directed chiefly, if not solely, against the General, it being admitted that the Minister had left nothing undone to ensure the success of it, and that the Admiral had acted in no respect inconsistently with his high character for judgment and spirit. It was said that the inactivity and timi-

* Lord Clive declared to the Parliamentary Committee of Enquiry, instituted A. D. 1773, "that he never called a Council of war but once, which was previous to his passing the Ganges on his famous expedition to Moorshedabad; and, if he had then followed the decision of the council, the Company had been undone."

dity of Sir John Mordaunt were less pardonable than the rashness and presumption of General Braddock, who, if he failed to attain his object, had at least sustained the national reputation by his courage; and so high did the clamor arise, that it was thought necessary to institute a court-martial for the trial of this Commander, by whom he was, to the amazement of the public, unanimously acquitted: And the sentence was universally contrasted with that of the former court, which had condemned an Admiral to death for not doing his utmost; whereas a General was now acquitted, though it was universally acknowledged that he had done nothing. But the failure of the enterprise against Rochefort, however it might excite the chagrin of the public, was of little estimation or importance in the view of the Court, when compared with the disasters which had befallen the army of observation in Germany. Early in the spring (1757) his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland had embarked for Hanover, in order to take upon him the command of the confederate troops, now, in consequence of the recent junction of the Prussians, amounting to about fifty thousand men. Mareschal D'Etrees, the French Commander, an officer of great ability, advancing from the banks of the Rhine, the passage of which the King of Prussia in vain urged the Duke to defend, the confederate army was compelled to retire beyond yond the Wefer: And the French General having passed this river also without opposition, attacked the Duke in his camp at Hastenbeck, July 25; and, while the battle was yet doubtful, the English Commander, from a defect, not of courage, but of military skill and judgment, is charged with giving orders for sounding a retreat. A redoubt in centre of the allied army having been carried by the French, it was instantly retaken, sword in hand, by the Hereditary Prince of Brunfwick, "who by this coup d'essai discovered, says the King of Prussia, that nature had destined him for a hero." The Duke being still pressed by the French army, retreated first to Nienburg, then to Verden, and at length to Stade. The Marechal D'Etrees, regarding with a watchful and penetrating eye the motions of the Duke, when urged to embrace a favorable moment of attack, replied that there was no occasion for fighting. And, in fact, his Royal Highness was quickly reduced, as the Marechal foresaw, to a most distressing dilemma. In front his farther march was arrested by the German ocean; on the right and left he was inclosed by the rivers Elbe and Wefer; and the French having taken possession of the passes as the confederate army receded, the Duke had no option remaining but to submit to terms of capitulation, which were signed, under the mediation of Denmark, in the month of September (1757), at Cloister.

Cloister-Seven, by which the Electorate of Hanover was left in the hands of the French; and the whole confederate army, amounting to about forty thousand Hessians, Hanoverians, and Brunswickers, were disarmed and disbanded—the King of Prussia having previously withdrawn his troops, from the apprehension of this catastrophe. On his return to England, the Duke of Cumberland not receiving those marks of gratitude and acknowledgement which he thought due to his eminent services, resigned all his military employments in high disgust, and henceforth took no farther public part in any civil or military transaction. The inglorious convention of Cloister-Seven seemed as it were the crisis of the war; and England was now reduced to that extreme point of depression from which she was destined, in gradual retrocession, to attain to a height of elevation unknown to the most brilliant æras of her former history.

After the unsuccessful campaign of 1757 in America, the Earl of Loudon returned to England, leaving the chief command in the hands of General Abercrombie, from whom it quickly devolved to Major-General, now Lord Amherst, who, on the arrival of Admiral Boscawen from England, early in the year 1758, with very powerful reinforcements, concerted with General Abercrombie a plan of spirited and active operations for the ensuing campaign. The troops now assembled, both regulars

lars and provincials, amounted to no less than fifty thousand men, a military force to which the new world had seen nothing comparable; and much too great to be employed on any single object. The garrison of Louisburg being greatly reduced in consequence of the perfect security it was supposed to enjoy after the abandonment of the expedition of the last summer, it was resolved to renew the attempt. And General Amherst, with twelve thousand men, being convoyed by the fleet under Admiral Boscawen, anchored June 2, in sight of the fortress, which, in a few days, was formally invested. The approaches were made with great skill and circumspection; and the Chevalier Droucourt, the Governor, seeing no prospect of relief, assented to a capitulation on the twenty-seventh of July. Exclusive of the city of Louisburg and the whole island of Cape Breton, six ships of the line and five frigates, which were stationed in the harbor for the protection of the place, were either destroyed or taken by the English. General Abercrombie himself undertook, at the head of a still greater force, to reduce the French forts on the lakes George and Champlain. The first attempted was Ticonderago, a fortress which commands the communication between the two lakes, surrounded on three sides with water, and, in front, secured by a morass, and farther defended, upon this emergency, with a breast-work, entrenchments, and and abbatis. The General, however, determined upon an assault; but met with a severe repulse, and was compelled to retreat with the loss of one thousand eight hundred men; with which disaster he was so much dispirited, that he immediately reembarked his troops, though still much superior in force to the enemy, and returned to the camp at Lake George, from whence he had taken his departure.

An event still the subject of tender recollection and regret in America, took place on this occasion in the death of Lord Howe, a young Nobleman who combined the most amiable manners with the most shining talents and the most heroic courage. His memory was honored by a vote of the Assembly of Massachusetts for the erection of a superb cenotaph, at the expense of the province, amongst the heroes and patriots of Britain, in the collegiate church of Westminster.

A considerable corps, however, detached by General Abercrombie, under Colonel Bradstreet, against Fort Frontenac, situated on the northern bank of the river St. Laurence, at the precise point of its departure from Lake Ontario, reduced this important post with little loss. And Brigadier Forbes, who was destined to command the expedition against Fort du Quesne, on the Ohio, finding it, on his arrival, dismantled and abandoned, immediately repaired and garrisoned the fort, changing changing its name, in compliment to the Minister, to Pittsburgh. And, in October, peace was established by a formal treaty between Great Britain and the Indian nations inhabiting the rich and fertile plains between the Lakes and the Ohio. At the grand conference which preceded this treaty, the following oration, not unworthy of historic notice, was addressed to the English Commissioners by one of the Sachems, delegated to conduct this negotiation on the part of the Indians: "Brethren—I have raised my voice, and all the Indians have heard me as far as the Twightwees, and have regarded my voice, and are now come to this place. Brethren, the cause why the Indians of Ohio left you was owing to yourselves. The Governor of Virginia settled in our lands, and disregarded our messages: But, when the French came to us, they traded with our people, used them kindly, and gained their affections. Our cousins the Minisinks tell us, they were wronged of a great deal of land, and pushed back by the English, settling so fast upon them as not to know whether they have any lands remaining in surety. You deal hardly with us; you claim all the wild animals of the forests, and will not let us come on your lands so much as to hunt after them; you will not let us peel the bark of a single tree to cover our cabins—surely this is hard! Our fathers, when they sold the land, did not purpose to deprive themselves of hunting the wild deer, or using a branch of wood. Brethren, we have already acquainted you with our grievances; and we have referred our cause to the great king. I desire to know if King GEORGE has yet decided this matter, and whether justice will be done to the Minisinks?"

Governor Bernard, in return, assured them that full satisfaction should be given to the Minisinks; and Governor Denny delivering to the Chief a belt and string of wampum, declared "the ancient union of the British and Indian nations to be renewed and confirmed, and that fresh earth was put to the roots of the tree of peace, in order that it may bear up against every storm, and flourish as long as the sun shines, and the rivers continue to flow."

These events sufficiently indicated that the fortune of the war had at length changed, and the French, who had been hitherto the assailants, now saw the necessity of concentrating their force, in order to defend themselves from future attack and invasion. General Amherst, who possessed in an high degree the spirit of military enterprize, had, on assuming the chief command, formed a project, which would doubtless have appeared romantic and impracticable to his predecessors, for the entire conquest of Canada in one campaign.

For the accomplishment of this grand scheme, Brigadier-General Wolfe, an officer who had distinguished tinguished himself, in a very remarkable manner, at late the siege of Louisburg, was directed, as soon as the navigation of the St. Laurence should be clear of ice, to proceed with a strong squadron of ships of war, and a large body of land-forces, to undertake the siege of Quebec, the capital of French America. General Amherst, in person, proposed, with the principal army, to reduce the forts of Ticonderago and Crown Point; to cross the lake Champlain, and, marching along the river Richelieu, and the southern banks of the St. Laurence, to join General Wolfe under the walls of Quebec. Lastly, Brigadier-General Prideaux, with another separate corps, reinforced by a numerous body of Indians, assembled and conducted by the influence and authority of Sir William Johnson, was destined to invest the important post and fortress of Niagara, which commanded the navigation of the lakes, and the communication of the rivers St. Laurence and Mississippi. After the reduction of Niagara, the forces were ordered to be embarked on the Lake Ontario, and proceeding down the river St. Laurence, to undertake the siege of Montreal, the second city of Canada, and then to join the grand army before Quebec. It is scarcely to be imagined that so magnificent and daring a project should, in the execution, prove completely successful in all its parts. It was however doubtless the conception of a great military bedding

genius;

genius ; and the final result of this plan forms the highest eulogium which can be bestowed upon it.

General Amherst, in the month of July, arrived at Ticonderago, which at first the enemy seemed preparing resolutely to defend : But, in the night of the 27th, they suddenly and unaccountably abandoned this strong and hitherto impregnable post, and retired to Crown Point. The General, after giving the necessary orders for the security of the fortress, embarked with the army, and reached Crown Point on the 4th of August ; but by this time Crown Point also was evacuated, and the English commander was informed that the French had retired to the Isle aux Noix, at the northern extremity of the lake Champlain, where they were reported to be encamped in force. The General, after making the most vigorous and indefatigable exertions to secure a naval superiority on the lake, again embarked his troops, in order to proceed to the attack of Isle aux Noix : But a continued succession of storms and tempests compelled him to desist from the prosecution of his design, and he returned to Crown Point, in the vicinity of which he took up his winter-quarters, in order to facilitate the early commencement of the ensuing campaign. Here he had the satisfaction to learn that the expedition against Niagara had terminated happily ; for though General Prideaux was unfortunately slain by the bursting of a shell in visiting the trenches,

General Johnson, who succeeded to the command, after defeating a body of forces which attempted the relief of the fort, had become master of it by capitulation, July 25 ; the projected design against Montreal, in consequence of various combining obstacles, nevertheless remaining for the present suspended.

But by far the most difficult and dangerous branch of the plan originally concerted, was allotted to General Wolfe, whose rising talents and reputation now began to excite universal attention. On the 26th of June, the armament destined for the invasion of Canada, arrived at the island of Orleans, formed by the branches of the river St. Laurence, and extending to the basin of Quebec. This metropolis is situated at the confluence of the rivers St. Laurence and St. Charles. The fortifications are strong, and the city elegant and extensive. It consists of an upper and a lower town ; the lower town is built upon the strand, which stretches along the base of the lofty rock on which the upper town is situated. This rock continues with a bold and steep front far to the westward, parallel to the river St. Laurence. On this side, therefore, the city might well be deemed absolutely inaccessible. On the other, it was protected by the river St. Charles, the channel of which is rough and broken, and its borders intersected with ravines. On the left bank of this river the French army, army, amounting to about 16,000 men, under the command of M. de Montcalm, were posted; the encampment extending to the river of Montmorenci to the east, and their rear was covered with impenetrable woods.

The English General, perfectly sensible that unless the enemy could be brought to a decisive engagement, his enterprize must prove abortive, resolved, after some feints, in vain made to induce his able and cautious antagonist to relinquish this advantageous post, to attack the French in their entrenchments, near the falls of Montmorenci. On the last day of July, dispositions being made for a general assault, the troops were landed under the cover of the cannon of the ships of war; but, notwithstanding the express orders given, not to march forward till the whole army was formed, the English grenadiers rushing to the attack with irregular impetuosity, were soon thrown into confusion by the enemy's fire, and suffered very severely in the retreat. The General advancing in person with the remaining brigades, the fugitives formed again in the rear of the army; but the plan of attack was effectually disconcerted; and the English commander was compelled to give orders for repassing the river to the island of Orleans, which was effected not without considerable loss.

At this period the General transmitted dispatches to England, penned with remarkable perspicuity and elegance, but in a tone of depression which demonstrated a perfect sense of the embarrassments of his situation. "We have, said he, almost the whole force of Canada to oppose. In such a choice of difficulties I own myself at a loss how to determine. The affairs of Great Britain, I know, require the most vigorous measures; but the courage of a handful of brave men should be exerted only where there is some hope of a favourable event *."

The disaster of Montmorenci made a deep impression on the lofty and susceptible mind of the English General. He was observed often to sigh; and, to his intimate friends, he declared his determination to die rather than endure the censure and reproach which invariably attend the want of success. An effort transcendently bold, and approaching in other circumstances to rashness and desperation, yet remained to be tried. A plan

* Though the disappointment of General Wolfe must have been inexpressibly great, at the failure of the concerted plan of co-operation on the part of General Amherst; yet it is highly pleasing to observe, that throughout this celebrated letter, not a symptom is to be found, of dissatisfaction at the conduct of that commander, whose utmost exertions General Wolfe was well assured would not be wanting to its accomplishment. The whole exhibits a picture of gloomy grandeur, of a mind revolving and meditating designs, of the temerity of which it is perfectly conscious.

was

was formed, in concert with the naval commander Admiral Saunders, for landing the troops on the northern bank of the river, above the city, and by scaling the heights, hitherto supposed inaccessible, to gain possession of the grounds at the back of the town, where it was but slightly fortified. The Admiral, in order to deceive the enemy, moved up the river several leagues beyond the spot fixed upon for the landing ; but, during the night, he fell down with the stream, in order to protect the disembarkment of the troops, which was happily accomplished in secrecy and silence. The precipice now remained to be ascended ; and, with infinite labor and difficulty, the troops sustaining themselves by the rugged projections of the rock, and the branches of the trees and plants which sprang from the innumerable clefts into which it was every-where broken, they at last attained the summit, and immediately formed in order of battle. The intelligence being quickly conveyed to M. de Montcalm that the English army was in actual possession of the heights of Abraham, that commander declared himself unable to express his astonishment, and immediately comprehended the necessity of risking an engagement, in order to save the city.

Abandoning, therefore, his strong camp of Montmorenci, he passed the river St. Charles, and advanced to the attack of the English army, with great intrepidity. A very warm engagement ensued, and General Wolfe, who stood conspicuous in the front of the line, received a shot in the wrist, which, wrapping a handkerchief around it, he seemed not to notice, and continued giving orders without the least emotion. But advancing at the head of the grenadiers, another ball pierced his breast, and compelled him to retire to a spot a little distant from the field of action, where he expressed the most eager anxiety to learn the fate of the battle. He was, after an interval of suspense, told that the enemy were visibly broken: And reclining, from extreme faintness, his head on the arm of an officer standing near him, he was in a short time aroused with the distant sound of They fly! they fly!—"Who fly?" exclaimed the dying hero—on being told "the French,"—"Then, said he, I depart content," and almost immediately expired in the arms of victory. A death more glorious, and attended with circumstances more picturesque and interesting, is no where to be found in the annals of history. The death of Epaminondas only, to which that of Wolfe has frequently been compared, seems to dispute the pre-eminence*.

The

* Sic certus hostes terga dare in fugam
Thebanus Heros "extrahe telum" ait:
Vultuque subridens ameno
Magnam animam exhilaratus efflat.

Ambo

The Generals Monckton and Townshend, after the loss of their commander, continued the fight with unabating ardor; and M. de Montcalm, the French commander, receiving a mortal wound, the French gave way on all sides, and a most complete victory was gained, at a comparatively inconsiderable expense. The city of Quebec, struck with consternation at this event, almost immediately capitulated, though still provided with the means of a vigorous defence, and the shattered remains of the French army retired with precipitation to Montreal.

In England this intelligence, which very closely followed the former doubtful dispatches of the General, excited that delirium of joy which the return of national prosperity, after a long series of national disasters, is alone adequate to inspire. This was damped only by the death of the hero who had achieved the conquest; but so fascinating were the glories with which it was invironed, that in fact

Ambo beati! Plaudite, milites,

Morte invidenda plaudite nobilem!

Te rura, fortunate, et urbes,

Te recinet, nemus omne, WOLF!

Vide CANADIA, an Ode published in the year 1760, and fraught with all the beauties of elegant and classic composition. The glorious deaths of other heroes press at the same time upon the imagination—of a Bayard; a Sydney; a Gaston de Foix;—of a Gustavus Adolphus; and of Constantine the last Emperor of the Greeks, which, though not adorned by the purple coloring of success, is perhaps beyond all others intrinsically illustrious.

it rather heightened than diminished the exultation of the triumph.

General Murray, who had been appointed to the government of Quebec, took every precaution that prudence could suggest to secure and maintain this important possession. Nor were they found superfluous; for, early in the spring of the year 1760, the Chevalier de Levis, who succeeded M. de Montcalm as commander of the French forces, assembled with great diligence, from all quarters, the troops remaining in Canada, and began his march from Montreal, in the month of April, hoping to recapture Quebec before the garrison could receive the expected succors from England. General Murray, though much inferior in numbers, took possession of an advantageous post in the vicinity of Quebec, and determined to risque an engagement, which, if it proved unsuccessful, would not prevent his retiring within the walls of the city, which he determined to defend to the last extremity. The great disparity of force soon decided the conflict in favor of the French, and the General retreated to Quebec, which was immediately invested by the French army. But on the intelligence that an English fleet destined for its relief, was already in the gulph of St. Laurence, they raised the siege with great precipitation, leaving their provisions, stores, and artillery, in the hands of General Murray. And the Marquis de Vaudreuil, Governor.

nor.

nor-General of Canada, now centered all his hopes in the defence of Montreal, which, in the expectation of an attack from General Amherst, he had strengthened with new fortifications, had recruited his army with new levies of troops, and had collected large magazines of military stores. The English commander, after detaching Colonel Haviland with a strong force to besiege the post occupied by the French at Isle aux Noix, proceeded himself to the banks of the lake Ontario, where he embarked his troops, and crossing the lakes reduced the Isle Royale, commanding the entrance of the great river St. Laurence, the navigation of which, to the island of Montreal, is rendered extremely dangerous, by the number of rapids and falls. The General, however, arrived with his army at Montreal, the beginning of September, with inconsiderable loss; and in a short time he was joined by General Murray, who had received orders to co-operate with him on the side of Quebec. And Colonel Haviland also, after the reduction of Isle aux Noix, had advanced with the forces under his command, to the south side of the river, opposite to Montreal. The Marquis de Vaudreuil perceiving himself completely invested, and despairing of relief, demanded a capitulation, which was granted upon very favorable terms. And thus the conquest of the province of Canada was finally completed—a conquest the most glorious and

and the most important ever achieved by the arms of Great Britain.

Uninterrupted prosperity also, during the same period, attended the operations of the war, on the part of England, in the other quarters of the globe. Early in the year 1758, a plan had been presented to the Minister, by one Cumming, an African merchant, of the pacific sect of Quakers, for the reduction of Fort Louis, on the river Senegal, which being examined and approved, a small Squadron was equipped, under the command of Captain Marsh, hoisting a broad pendant; Mr. Cumming embarking also on board the Commodore's ship, as a promoter and director of the expedition. After dispersing some armed vessels, which opposed their entrance into the river, the fort and adjoining factory surrendered without a blow, to the Commodore; and Mr. Cumming defended his recommendation as perfectly consonant to his religious principles, affirming himself to have been previously persuaded that it would prove a bloodless conquest.

And in the latter end of this year, a successful attempt was made, under the conduct of Commodore Keppel, with a more considerable force, upon the Island of Goree, situated at the mouth of the Senegal. The island was defended by two small forts, and several batteries, mounted with more than one hundred pieces of cannon; but they were

K. GEORGE II.

were soon silenced by a furious cannonade from the ships of war. During the attack, the opposite shores were covered with multitudes of the natives, who expressed, with loud clamor and uncouth gesticulations, their astonishment at the terrible execution performed by the British squadron.

Nearly at the same time, a very powerful armament, with six regiments of infantry on board under the command of Generals Hopson and Barrington, sailed from St. Helens, and being joined on their arrival in Carlisle Bay, in the island of Barbadoes, by a considerable additional force under Commodore Moore, the united squadrons proceeded to Martinique; but finding this important island better prepared for its defence than was expected, they directed their course to Guadaloupe, of which, after a long and obstinate resistance, they made themselves masters—the neighbouring isles of Deseada and Marigalante surrendering also on capitulation. Notwithstanding the ill success of the expedition against Rochefort, the Minister determined upon another attempt of the same nature; the execution of which was entrusted to Commodore, now Lord Howe, an officer of approved judgment and gallantry, who disembarking the troops, agreeably to his instructions, on the coast of Normandy, took possession of the town of Cherbourg without opposition: And, after destroying the harbor and basin of that place, upon which much much labor and much money had been expended, the fleet set sail for England; but, in a short time, it again weighed and stood to the southward; and the land forces, under General Bligh, disembarked, under the cannon of the shipping, two leagues to the westward of St. Maloes, which they found, however, too strongly fortified to be carried by a coup de main. The General, therefore, determined to penetrate into the open country, and advanced, for what purpose is not easy to divine, to a considerable distance beyond the possibility of protection from the fleet. The unimportant operations of this predatory war soon received an alarming interruption from the intelligence that the Duc d'Aguillon, Governor of Bretagne, was in full march, at the head of eighteen regular battalions and squadrons, to intercept their retreat. The General immediately began his march for the bay of St. Gas, where the English fleet lay at anchor: But, before he could complete the reembarkation of his troops, the rear-guard, consisting of fifteen hundred men, was attacked by the French, and the far greater part of them killed or taken. The utility of expeditions of this nature, even when most successful, seems very liable to question; and the expense attending the present unfortunate attempt, in particular, was so great, and the damage sustained by the enemy so trivial, that it was by some persons

info-

insolently styled "a scheme to break windows with guineas."

In the ensuing summer (1759), Admiral Rodney was detached with a squadron, under pretext of impeding the rendezvous of the transports collecting in its vicinity, to bombard the town of Havre de Grace, which was, at the first alarm, deserted by the inhabitants in great consternation. Nineteen hundred shells, and eleven hundred carcasses, were, it is said, expended in this direful act of unavailing vengeance.

In the succeeding month of August, Admiral Boscawen, who now commanded in the Mediterranean, had, however, an opportunity of asserting the honor of the British flag in a manner much more effectual. M. de la Clue, endeavoring to pass the Strait of Gibraltar with a considerable squadron, was intercepted by the English Admiral off Cape Lagos; and, after a fierce conflict, the French Admiral's own ship, the Ocean of eighty guns, and three other capital ships, struck their colors to the English. This victory was soon succeeded by another of yet greater importance. Vast preparations had been, for some time past, making in the French ports in the Channel, with a view, as was imagined, to a descent in some part of Great Britain or Ireland. And a powerful fleet was actually equipped in the harbor of Brest, which was long prevented from putting to sea by the vigilance gillance of Sir Edward Hawke, who had, with a superior force, blockaded that port during the greater part of the summer. At length, being driven from this station by stress of weather, M. de Conflans, the French Admiral, embraced the opportunity of weighing anchor from Brest Water with an armament of twenty-one ships of the line. On the first intelligence of their departure, Sir Edward Hawke sailed in pursuit of them. As soon as the French Admiral perceived the English fleet off Quiberon Bay, he retired close in shore, in order to avoid an engagement. The English Commander, however, was not deterred, by his knowledge of the coast, which is in this part rendered extremely dangerous by rocks, shoals, and quicksands, from following and attacking the enemy with the most undaunted resolution; the weather also was uncommonly tempestuous, the days much diminished in length, and the English Admiral had to encounter the additional disadvantage of a lee shore. About three o'clock on the twentieth of November 1759 the battle began, and continued till the fleets were enveloped in darkness, which seasonably intervened to save the French fleet from total destruction. Two capital ships, the Superbe and Thesée, were sunk during the action; the Hero struck her colors, but no boat could be sent with safety to take possession; the Soleil Royale, the flag-ship of the French Commander, was next day day burnt by her own crew, to prevent her falling into the hands of the English; and two other ships of the line were also stranded and destroyed. The rest of the fleet, with much difficulty, sheltered themselves in the river Vilaine, where they were long blockaded, but at length found means to escape to Rochefort. This was a fatal blow to the French marine; and, after this defeat, the French Court attempted no further naval expedition of moment. Very important advantages also were obtained in the latter years of the war by the British arms on the coast of India, of which it will now be necessary to offer a concise but distinct narration.

HINDOSTAN, that vast country, extending two thousand miles in length from the mountains of Tartary and Thibet on the north, to Cape Comorin, divided only by a narrow strait from the beautiful island of Ceylon, on the south, presents, among the various regions of the earth, a most conspicuous and interesting object of political and philosophical contemplation. The civilization of this immense peninsula may be traced back to an æra of the most remote antiquity. Learning and the arts, which have descended to the modern nations of Europe from the Romans and the Greeks, were indubitably transmitted or transferred to them from the Phœnicians and Egyptians; who, as there is great reason to believe, derived the radical principles of the knowledge which they possessed from the sages of Hindostan, with whom science and the arts seem to have originated. And it is very remarkable, that such as the inhabitants of Hindostan are described to have been two thousand years ago, such they still remain; and the established laws, institutions, customs, manners, and religion, of India, have, in this long succession of ages, suffered neither any essential addition or diminution. Nothing, indeed, can be imagined more strongly calculated to perpetuate the system originally formed than the singular and remarkable division of this people into tribes, professions, or CASTES, separated by a superstition so rigorous, as to render it unlawful and profane even to eat or drink out of the same vessel, excepting on their solemn festivals in the same temple or pagoda, when joining in the same religious sacrifice. All the different tribes, the military caste only excepted, are required, under certain exemptions or indulgencies, to abstain from animal food; and the high and venerable caste of the Brahmans in particular, from whom more rigid examples of virtue are expected, touch nothing that has life, but subsist entirely upon milk, fruit, and vegetables*. The principles of their philosophy,
fages

* The principal castes of India are, the Brahmans, or men of science, including the priesthood; the Khatries, or the military, and proprietors of land; the Bhyse or Banian, comprehending the merchants and cultivators of the soil; and the Sooderahs, or

phy, as well as the mysteries of their religion, are contained in certain records of the most obscure and recondite antiquity, styled the Veds or Vedams, supposed to be of divinely-inspired origin, and written in the Sanscrit language, which has long ceased to be a living tongue, and is now understood only by the learned Brahmins, whose peculiar profession includes mechanics and laborers, including the bulk of the people. But these are subdivided into many others, all of which are kept religiously distinct. In the mystic language of the Vedams, the Brahmins are said to be created from the mouth of Brimha, the Khatris from his arms, the Bhyse from his body, and the Sooderahs from his feet. The Hallachores, styled, in the Sanscrit, Chandalas, are the refuse and outcasts of all the different tribes; but the number of them is happily inconsiderable, as they are held in a kind of religious abhorrence; their very touch, or the slightest accidental intercourse with them, being accounted, even by the lowest Sooderah, an almost indelible pollution. Also, scattered throughout the immense regions of Hindostan, are to be found multitudes of wandering devotees, or ascetics, known under the various appellations of Yoghees, Sonassees, Faquiers, &c. &c. Deeply impressed with the doctrine taught by the Brahmin philosophy, that man's supreme felicity consists in a kind of intellectual apathy or absorption, these enthusiasts, with deplorable folly, inflict upon themselves the most rigorous and almost incredible corporeal penances, vainly hoping, by this means, to assimilate and exalt their minds more nearly to the perfection of the divine nature, and to detach themselves more effectually from that system of matter which they are taught to condemn as base and vile. And such is the veneration in which this species of voluntary martyrdom is held, that the profane and abject Chandala is not admitted to the enviable privilege of devoting himself to this sacred profession.

vince and privilege it is to read and meditate these sacred volumes. The Khatries, who rank next in dignity, are permitted to hear them read; but the inferior tribes are restrained to the knowledge of the Shastabs, which are commentaries of high and established authority upon the Vedams, adapted to popular use. The grand and fundamental article of their religious creed is, that there is One Supreme God, whose essence is infinitely removed from human comprehension, Eternal, Omnipotent, Invisible, who ordains and accepts the various religious rites of various nations, and that he is best pleased and propitiated by charity and good works. They teach that this God is to be worshipped by SYMBOLS, representing his various attributes—a most pernicious and fatal error, with admirable wisdom guarded against in the Jewish Decalogue—which, from a system of pure and refined theism, has converted, by a natural and irresistible gradation, the popular religion of the Hindoos into gross idolatry*. The philosophers of Hindostan admit, without

* When BRAHM determined to create the universe, the Vedams teach that he first commanded into existence the Gods Vishnoo, Brimha, and Shivah, to whom he delegated the task of forming, preserving, and governing, all things which it contains. This mythological account, however, is understood to be entirely allegorical; and this TRIAD or TRINITY of divine emanations, expressed in the Sanscrit language by the mystic word OUM, are unquestionably nothing more than symbols of the out hesitation, the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, which they conceive to be an emanation from the different energies of the divine nature, or of the power, wisdom, and goodness, of the Supreme Being. This is the Trinity with which the mind of PLATO was so deeply impressed and enraptured, and which, in consequence of the wide diffusion of the Platonic system of philosophy, blended itself so intimately with the learned theories of the early heathen converts to Christianity. Such was the scientific ardor of this celebrated Grecian, and such his admiration of the Indian philosophy, that we are told he once entertained a purpose—emulous, perhaps, of the fame of Pythagoras—of visiting Hindostan in person: “Ad Indos, says Apuleius, et Magos intendisset animum, nisi eum bella tunc vetuissent Asiatica.” In the famous dialogues preserved in the Sanscrit language, between Vishnoo and Arjoon, Vishnoo says, “All things proceed from me, and there is not any thing, animate or inanimate, without me. In me all things are repositied. I am in the incense, in the fire, and in the victim. He who believeth in UNITY, and worshippeth me present in all things, dwelleth in me. They who, delighting in the welfare of all nature, serve me in my incorruptible, ineffable, and invisible form, omnipotent, incomprehensible, exalted, fixed, and immoveable, with subdued passions, and who are the same in all things, shall come unto me.” Arjoon says, in reply, “Reverence be unto thee, again and again reverence, O thou who art all in all! Great is thy power, and great thy glory. By thee the universe was spread abroad. Thou art Vayoo the God of the winds, Agnee the God of fire, Varoon the God of the ocean, &c. Worthy to be adored, bear with me as a friend with a friend, a lover with the beloved.” Vishnoo answers—“He is dear to me who is free from enmity, merciful, and exempt from pride and selfishness, who is the same in pain and in pleasure, patient of wrongs, contented, and whose mind is from the divine essence; and capable of an accidental and temporary conjunction with, and transmigration

fixed on me alone. He is my beloved, of whom mankind is not afraid, and who is not afraid of mankind, who is unsolicitous about events, to whom praise and blame are as one, who has no particular home, and is of a steady mind. The man who, performing the duties of life and quitting all interest in them, placeth his affections upon BRAHM the Supreme, is not tainted with sin, but remaineth, like the leaf of the lotos, unaffected by the waters." KRISHEN, or Krishna, is the God Vishnoo in one of his various incarnations; in which capacity he is represented as a blooming and beautiful youth, with the characteristic appendage of a flute or lyre, resembling the Apollo of the Greeks; and, amongst many other striking analogies between the Indian and Grecian mythologies, described as encircled by the same number of graceful nymphs endowed with the same divine accomplishments, styled the Gopias, who are said to have fixed their residence in the delightful groves of Matra. In a hymn addressed to Kama-diva, or the God of Love, in the Hindoo system, son of Maya, the power of attraction, we read, in the elegant translation of Sir William Jones—

Can men resist thy power when Krishen yields?

Krishen, who still in Matra's holy fields

Tunes harps immortal, and to strains divine

Dances by moonlight with the Gopia nine.

In the temples of Vishnoo this God is worshipped under the symbol of an human figure, having a circle of heads and a multiplicity of hands, to denote the universality of his knowledge, presence, and power. The most celebrated of these temples or pagodas is situated on the banks of the Coleroon, near the western extremity of the island of Seringham. It consists of seven square inclosures, standing at three hundred and fifty feet asunder.

In

migration to, any organical system of matter; and into the same infinite essence from which it originally

In the inmost inclosure are the altars and the image of the Deity. The grand entrance is richly ornamented with pillars of granite of prodigious size. When the wars in the Carnatic between the French and English commenced, these rude invaders scrupled not to profane, by the entrance of their troops, the first courts of this hallowed edifice. And we are told that, on their approach, a Brahman, standing on the summit of the lofty portico of the temple, cried to them with a loud voice to desist from this impiety; but finding his menaces and supplications equally disregarded, he threw himself down with violence upon the pavement below, and was instantly dashed to pieces. It is a singularity of the Hindoo system, that it refuses to admit proselytes; for the Hindoo philosophers maintain that the different modes of faith and worship established in different countries, when practised with a pure mind, are equally acceptable to the SUPREME, to whom they give the appellations of "the Principle of Truth," the "Spirit of Wisdom," the "Universal Soul," whose essence pervades all things, who fills all space, and who cannot therefore be justly portrayed under any visible and distinct form. A celebrated Danish missionary, M. Ziegenbalg, tells us "that the Brahmans uniformly affirmed to him that God was a Being wholly spiritual and incomprehensible; but that the adoration before idols being ordained by their religion, God would receive and consider it as adoration offered to himself—in the multitude of images they professed to adore One Divine Essence." M. Bernier, a French traveller in the last century, who passed some time at the city of Benares, the sacred seat of Indian science, affirms, that he was told, in a conference which he held with the chief of the Pundits, "that though they had, in their temples, numerous images or idols in order to fix the attention of the worshipper—" afin qu'il y ait quelque chose devant les yeux qui ally sprang, after completing its destined series of transmigrations, it will be ultimately absorbed, arrête l'esprit ;" yet the honors paid to them were entirely to be referred to the Being whose attributes they represented." And St. Francis Xavier, the great Apostle of India, at a still earlier period, informs us, that a Brahman on the coast of Malabar revealed to him in confidence, "that one of the mysteries of the Hindoo doctrine consisted in believing that there was only one God, creator of the heavens, and of the earth; and that this God alone was worthy to be adored." The learned Brahmans, employed by Mr. Hastings—in his laudable attention, amidst the complicated cares of government, to scientific researches—for the purpose of translating from the Sanscrit to the Persian language, the authentic records of their laws and customs, say, in the preliminary discourse affixed to their work, "From men of enlightened understanding, and sound judgment, who, in their researches after truth, have swept away from their hearts malice and opposition, it is not concealed that the diversities of belief which are causes of enmity and envy to the ignorant, are in fact a demonstration of the power of the Supreme Being. The truly intelligent well know, that the difference and variety of created things, and the contrarieties of constitutions, are types of his wonderful attributes, whose complete power formed all things in the animal, vegetable, and material world; whose benevolence selected man to have dominion and authority over the rest, who having bestowed on him judgment and understanding, gave him supremacy over the regions of the world, who having put into his hands the control and disposal of all things, appointed to each nation its own religion, and who constituted a variety of tribes, and a multiplicity of customs; but views, with pleasure, in every place, the mode of worship particularly appointed to it. He is with

The

the

The general characteristics of this people are mildness, simplicity, and indolence. They delight to repose the attendants upon the mosque, in counting the sacred beads; and he is at the temple with the Hindoos, at the adoration of the idols." The grand dogmas of Indian theology are exhibited with the blended energies of philosophy and poetry, in an ancient hymn, or divine ode, addressed to NARAYANA, or the Divine Intellect as it appears in the animated translation of Sir William Jones, from which these stanzas are transcribed.

SPIRIT of Spirits, who thro' every part Of space expanded, and of endless time
Beyond the stretch of laboring thought sublime, Bad'st uproar into beauteous order start;
Before heav'n was, THOU art!
Ere spheres beneath us roll'd, or spheres above,
Ere earth in firmamental ether hung,
Thou sat'st alone; till thro' thy mystic love
Things unexisting to existence sprung.—

* * *

—Wrapt in eternal solitary shade,
Th' impenetrable gloom of light intense,
Impervious, inaccessible, immense,
Ere spirits were infus'd, or forms display'd,
BRAHM his own mind survey'd.—

* * *

—Mountains whose radiant spires
Presumptuous rear their summits to the skies,
And blend their emerald hue with sapphire light, Smooth meads and lawns, that glow with varying dyes
Of dew-bespangled leaves, and blossoms bright,
Hence! vanish from my sight.

repose under the romantic shade of their vast forests; or to refresh and purify themselves with frequent bathings and ablutions in their majestic and salubrious streams; especially coveting to immerge in the sacred waters of the Ganges, for which celebrated river they universally entertain a superstitious and enthusiastic reverence. The famous expedition of Alexander into India was rather a discovery than a conquest. But the more recent invasion of Tamerlane was attended with serious and lasting consequences. That illustrious oriental victor, after subduing the more considerable northern provinces of the Peninsula, fixed his imperial throne at Dehli, where the Great Moguls his descendants, now reduced to the mere phantoms and shadows of royalty, still continue to reside. For several ages, however, they retained great power and authority, and the empire of Hindostan was divided into extensive kingdoms or provinces, which were governed by viceroys, styled Subahs, and subordinate governors, under the appellation of Na-

Delusive pictures! unsubstantial shows!
 My soul absorb'd, ONE only Being knows
 Of all perceptions, one abundant source,
 Whence every object, every moment flows;
 Suns hence derive their force,
 Hence planets learn their course;
 But suns and fading worlds I view no more,
 God only I perceive, God only I adore.

bobs

bobs and Rajahs, tributary to, and removable at, the pleasure of the Emperor.

At so recent a period as the commencement of the present century, Aurengzebe swayed the sceptre of the Moguls, with unabated majesty and splendor. But the power of this house received a tremendous shock from the invasion of the Persians, under the famous Shah Nadir, or Kouli Khan: And the governors of the provinces, seizing with eagerness the favorable moment, threw off their dependency upon the Emperor, and almost universally established their authority as sovereign princes of the empire, of which the Mogul is at present regarded only as the nominal head. Tamerlane, the founder of the Mogul empire, and the Mogul and other Tartar tribes, who acquired, in virtue of his conquests, permanent establishments in India, being zealous professors of the religion of Mahomed, the viceroys of the provinces, the viziers, and other great officers of state, were from that period invariably selected from the number of the faithful; but few or no innovations were attempted in the internal government or constitution of the empire. And the wisdom of Tamerlane, which is no less the subject of oriental panegyric than his valour, appears in no respect more conspicuous than in his cautious avoidance of those measures of political violence, which would probably have converted his newly-acquired dominions nions into one vast scene of desolation and anarchy*.

In
 * The Subahs and Nabobs are universally Mahomedans—the Rajahs, Mirzahs, Omrahs, and other subordinate Governors or Princes, are chiefly Hindoos. In a remarkable petition or remonstrance, presented by the Rajah Jussiwont Sing to the celebrated Aurengzebe, in consequence of an oppressive capitation recently and arbitrarily imposed throughout all the provinces and kingdoms of Hindostan, by that imperious and warlike Emperor, we find the following passages, which exhibit a striking picture of the antient and accustomed tenor of the Mogul administration in India.—“ May it please your Majesty, your royal ancestor, Mahomed-Jelaul-ul-Deen-Akbar, whose throne is now in heaven, conducted the affairs of this empire in equity and firm security, for the space of fifty-two years, preserving every tribe of men in ease and happiness; whether they were followers of Jesus, or of Moses, or of Mahomed, Were they Brahmans, were they of the sect of the Dharians, which denies the eternity of matter, or of that which ascribes the existence of the world to chance, they all equally enjoyed his countenance and favor—insomuch that he was distinguished by his people, in gratitude, by the appellation of “Guardian of Mankind.” His Majesty, Mahomed Noor-ul-Deen-Jehangheer, whose dwelling is now in paradise, extended, for a period of twenty-two years, the shadow of his protection over the heads of his people. Nor less did the illustrious Shah Jehân, by a propitious reign of thirty-two years, acquire to himself immortal reputation, the glorious reward of clemency and virtue. Such were the benevolent inclinations of your ancestors: Wheresoever they directed their steps, conquest and prosperity went before them. How can the dignity of the Sovereign be preserved, who employs his power in exacting heavy tributes from

In consequence of the important discovery made by the celebrated Portuguese navigator, Vasco de Gama, of a passage to India by the Cape of Good Hope, the attention of the European nations was powerfully attracted by the immense riches of Hindostan, now placed as it were within the general reach, particularly that of the Portuguese themselves, who established, by extraordinary exertions of valor, a commercial and political empire in India, of which the city of Goa was the emporium and metropolis. When Portugal was annexed by from his people? At this juncture, it is told from east to west, that the Emperor of Hindostan, regardless of the illustrious honor of his Timurean descent, will exercise his power over Brahmans, Sanorahs, Sonassees—that he will condescend to oppress the poor Indian devotee, the solitary inoffensive anchoret. If your Majesty places any faith in those books, by distinction called divine, you will there be instructed that God is the God of all mankind, and not the God of Mahommedans alone. The Pagan and Mussulman are equal in his presence.—In the mosque his name is invoked—in the pagoda he is the object of adoration. To vilify the religion of other men is to set at nought the pleasure of the Almighty. In fine, the tribute you demand from the Hindoos is repugnant to justice—it is equally foreign to good policy; and moreover it is an innovation, and an infringement of the laws of Hindostan. It is wonderful, that the ministers of your government should have neglected to instruct your Majesty in the rules of rectitude and honor.” If any credit be due to the doctrine of the metempsychosis, surely the soul of this illustrious Rajah must have transmigrated into the body of a Montesquieu, a Locke, or a Turgot!

the

the arms of Philip II. to the crown of Spain, Holland successfully contended with that power for pre-eminence in India. And England and France were at length induced, from an increasing attention to their commercial interests, and without any ambition of dominion, to form settlements both on the eastern and western coasts of the peninsula. During the violent and frequent contests between these rival nations, destined to carry their rivalry into every part of the globe, no transactions of sufficient moment to demand a place in general history are to be found relative to India for a long succession of years.

At the period of the accession of the House of Brunswick, England was, on the Western or Malabar coast, in possession of the island of Bombay, and the factory of Surat : On the opposite, or Coromandel coast, of Fort St. David's, and farther to the northward, of Fort St. George, usually styled Madrafs, from its contiguity to that city, which, with several villages in the vicinity, was purchased in the last century, by the East India Company, of the King of Golconda : Still farther to the north, at the mouth of the Ganges, was Fort William, closely adjoining the town of Calcutta, a vast and populous commercial mart, situated in the kingdom of Bengal.

The commerce of the French chiefly centered in the city of Pondicherry, a large and beautiful town town on the Coromandel coast, between the Forts St. David and St. George. Chandernagore, on the Ganges, ranked next in importance to Pondicherry, and they had also established factories at Rajapore, Calicut, and Surat, on the western side of the continent. During the course of the war which commenced in the year 1740, Fort St. George, or Madrafs, the residence of the Governor-General, and the seat of the civil administration, extending over all the English settlements in India, was conquered by the French; but restored in exchange for Cape Breton, at the ensuing pacification of Aix-la-Chapelle.

Some years previous to that period, M. Dupleix had been appointed to the Governor-Generalship of the French settlements in India—a man of singular ability and daring ambition, who seized with avidity every opportunity to extend and establish the empire of France in Hindostan. Nizam-al-Muluc, the Subah or Viceroy of the Decan, in the year 1745, had constituted, in virtue of his office, Anaverdi-Khan, Nabob of the province of Arcot, a dependency upon his government. The Subah not long surviving this appointment, was succeeded by his son, Nazir-Zing, whose claim to the succession was strongly opposed by his own kinsman Muzapher-Zing—for by these uncouth names, to our ears of barbarous sound, must the page of history, in recording the transactions actions of the European nations in India, be darkened and disfigured. Muzapher-Zing had recourse to the assistance of M. Dupleix, who readily granted him powerful succors, in consideration and prospect of great future advantages. Thus reinforced, and joined by Chunda-Saib, a man of high rank and influence in the Subahdary, he took the field against Nazir-Zing, who was strongly supported by the English, from motives similar to those which actuated M. Dupleix. In a short time Muzapher-Zing was reduced to absolute submission, and Nazir-Zing, in clemency; spared his life; but detained him as a state-prisoner. In this situation Muzapher-Zing found means to carry on dark and dangerous intrigues with Dupleix and Chunda-Saib, who had taken refuge in Pondicherry, and even with the Ministers of Nazir-Zing; and a deep and traiterous conspiracy was formed, in consequence of which Nazir-Zing was murdered in his camp, and Muzapher-Zing proclaimed Subah of the Decan. Chunda-Saib was, in consequence of this revolution, appointed Nabob of Arcot, Anaverdi-Khan, the late Nabob, having been previously defeated and slain, and his son Mahomed-Ali-Khan reduced to the necessity of putting himself under the protection of the English government at Madrafs. Muzapher-Zing did not long enjoy the fruits of his crimes; for, by a conspiracy similar to that by which he had himself himself risen to the throne, he was suddenly hurled from it: And the chiefs of the conspiracy, after putting this faithless usurper to death, proclaimed Sallabat-Zing, brother to Nazir-Zing, Subah of the DECAN.

On the other hand, the MOGUL, by an Imperial phirmaund, appointed Gawzedi Khan, the elder brother of Sallabat-Zing, to the Viceroyalty; at the same time declaring Chunda-Saib a traitor, and confirming Mahomed-Ali Khan in the government of Arcot. But the mandate of the Emperor would have been of little avail without the support and assistance of the English Company, who determined upon sending a considerable military force, at the head of which was placed Captain Clive, in the sequel so famous under the title of Lord Clive, into the province of Arcot, who, conducting all his operations with a vigor and dispatch which at once established his reputation as a military commander, took possession of the city of Arcot in the summer of 1751. Chunda-Saib having assembled a considerable army, with the aid of M. Dupleix, invested the city of Arcot, but was compelled to raise the siege with great precipitation; and was afterwards, in repeated engagements, defeated and foiled by the English Commander. In the spring of 1752, Major-General Lawrence, Commander in Chief of the Company's troops, took the field in person, and attacking the grand army of the enemy, headed by the Nabob Chunda-Saib, he gained a complete victory. Chunda-Saib being taken prisoner, had his head struck off by order of the Rajah of Tanjore, a neighbouring Prince of India, in alliance with the Company. M. Dupleix now proclaimed Rajah Saib, son of Chunda-Saib, Nabob of Arcot. And Sallabat-Zing, in return for the powerful support he had received from the French in the Decan, and having devised means to rid himself of his competitor Gawzedi Khan by poison, made a grant to M. Dupleix of all the English possessions to the northward of Pondicherry. But the French Governor being recalled before this grant could be carried into effect, and the Sieur Godeheu, the new Governor, professing the most pacific intentions, a provisional treaty was quickly agreed upon on the footing of uti possidetis, till fresh instructions should arrive from their respective Courts or principals in Europe. This interval of quiet, however, was of short duration; for no sooner was the inimical disposition of the two Courts ascertained, than hostilities recommenced in the Carnatic, and were carried on with various success, but, upon the whole, with considerable advantage by General Lawrence on the part of the English, when the attention of that Commander was, by a series of extraordinary and interesting events, diverted to another part of the Continent, the peace of which had hitherto remained undisturbed by European ambition.
by

tion. Ali-Verdi-Khan, Subah of Bengal, with the contiguous provinces of Bahar and Orissa, a Prince who had forced his way to the throne by great crimes, and had maintained possession of it by great talents, dying in April 1756, was succeeded by his adopted son Sou-Rajah-Dowla, the grandson of his brother Hadjee Hamet, a young man immersed in debauchery, weak in his understanding, violent in his passions, and profligate in his morals. Ali-Verdi-Khan, notwithstanding his early and continued partiality for this unhappy youth, with reason dreaded the consequences of his elevation to the Musnud. In his last illness, he obliged Sou-Rajah-Dowla to swear upon the Koran never more to touch any intoxicating liquor, a vow which he observed with surprising and undeviating fidelity. The Subah, feeling the near and rapid approach of death, addressed his adopted son and heir in the following words: "My life has been a life of war and stratagem. For what have I fought, to what have my counsels tended but to secure, my son, to you a quiet succession to my Subahdary! My fears for you have rendered my nights sleepless. I considered who had power to give you trouble after I am gone hence. Hussein, Cooley-Khan, by his reputation, wisdom, courage, and affection to Shah Amet-Jung and his house, I feared would obstruct your government; but his power is no more. Monichund Dewan, who might have been your dangerous enemy, I have taken into favor. But, my son, keep in view the power of the European nations in this country. This I would have freed you from, if God had lengthened my days. The work must now be yours. Their wars and perfidious politics should keep you waking. The power of the English is great; reduce them first; the others will then give you little trouble. Suffer them not, my son, to have forts or soldiers; if you do, the country is not yours." Strongly impressed with these ideas, the new Subah viewed, with the highest alarm and apprehension, the additional fortifications carrying on at Fort William, in consequence of the war now declared against France, and from the prosecution of which he repeatedly required the Governor to desist. But his orders being neglected or evaded, he appeared suddenly before Calcutta, in the month of June, with a large body of troops, and summoned the fort and city to surrender. Mr. Holwell, who acted as Governor, made a resolute defence, but was at length compelled to submit to superior force. The Subah, notwithstanding his assurances of protection from personal injury, instantly ordered the English garrison, amounting to one hundred and forty-six persons, into confinement. And there being, at a small distance, a strong stone prison, forming within the walls a cube of about eighteen feet, open only to the westward by two windows, strongly barred barred with iron, they were conveyed for immediate security to this dungeon. Mr. Holwell, on entering the place, immediately conceived all the horrors which must ensue, if they failed in obtaining a speedy release; and accosting the Jemmutdaur or officer of the Indian guard, promised to gratify him with a thousand rupees if he would remove one half of them to a separate apartment. The Jemmutdaur, allured by the prospect of this reward, assured him he would use his utmost endeavor to procure for them this indulgence, and retired for that purpose; but returning in a short time, he told the Governor that the Subah, by whose order alone such a step could be taken, was asleep, and no person durst disturb his repose. Mr. Holwell, in his pathetic narration of this unexampl'd scene of distress, compares their situation, in this dark and sultry cell, to that of so many miserable animals in an exhausted receiver—no circulation of fresh air sufficient to continue life, and not enough divested of its vivifying particles to put a speedy period to it. A most profuse perspiration, accompanied with a raging thirst, soon took place, which, becoming each moment more insupportable, gradually changed into frenzy and delirium. The prison now resounded with the ravings of despair, and nature being at length reduced to extremity, with the groans and broken accents of the dying. In the morning twenty-three only were found alive, and in these scarcely were there any perceptible remains of sensation or sensibility. Their sufferings, however, appeared to make little impression upon the ferocious and obdurate heart of the Subah, who visibly exulted in the success of his enterprise—not having the least conception that the English would return in force to Calcutta; and contemptuously declaring, that he did not believe there were ten thousand fighting men in all *Frenghistan. The wretched remains of the factory were now embarked on board a few trading vessels lying at the mouth of the Ganges; and these the Subah did not offer to molest. He even expressed his wishes that the English merchants would return to Calcutta, if they could be satisfied to live under his government, without laws or fortifications of their own, and carry on their traffic like the Armenians and his own native subjects. And happy for mankind assuredly would it have been, had Europe never extended her views farther than this in India. No sooner, however, was the intelligence of this calamity conveyed to Madras, than vigorous preparations were made by the English government to revenge the injury, and obliterate the disgrace. A formidable armament under the command of Admiral Watson and Colonel Clive, to the great astonishment of the Subah, anchored in the Ganges

* i. e. The country of the Franks—the appellation universally given to the Europeans throughout the East.

in December, and immediately commencing their operations, Calcutta was invested and reduced in the month of January (1757), and also the city of Hughley on the Ganges, where the principal magazines of the Subah were deposited. Soon after which, the Subah himself, who had assembled a vast army in order to repel the invaders, was attacked by Colonel Clive, and obliged to retreat in confusion, and with considerable loss. Intimidated by the successes of the English, he consented to sign articles of peace, February 9, 1757, by which it was stipulated that the factories and possessions belonging to the English Company should be restored, and full compensation made for their losses; and, in general, that whatever rights and privileges had been at any time granted to the Company by virtue of the phirmaunds of the Emperor should be confirmed and ratified. After the conclusion of this treaty, the English Commanders proceeded to the attack of the French fortress and factory of Chandernagore; the reduction of which filled the Nabob with new apprehensions and alarms. And he remonstrated in strong terms to Admiral Watson against these acts of violence: "It is, said the Subah, contrary to all rule and custom that you should bring your animosities and differences into my country; it has never been known since the days of Timur that the Europeans made war upon one another within the Emperor's dominions. If you are determined to besiege the French factories, I shall be necessitated, in honor and duty to my Sovereign, to assist them with my troops." But Admiral Watson, regardless of his remonstrances, and jealous of his designs, declared to him, "that, if he protected the King's enemies, he would light up a flame in his country that all the waters of the Ganges would not be able to extinguish." Such, indeed, was the capricious and tyrannic conduct of Sou-Rajah-Dowla, that those who were originally most attached to his interests began to be weary of his government. Amongst other men of high rank in the Subahdary of whom he entertained just suspicion, was Meer-Jaffier-Ali-Khan, nearly allied to the Subah by his marriage with the sister of Ali-Verdi-Khan. In the vehemence of his passion he had been heard to declare that he would have the head of Meer-Jaffier: And Meer-Jaffier, sensible of the imminent dangers of his situation, made secret proposals to the English Resident at the Court of Moorshedabad, the capital of Bengal, which were eagerly embraced by the English Council and Commandants at Calcutta, for the deposition of Sou-Rajah-Dowla, and the advancement of Meer-Jaffier to the Musnud. The jealousies of the Subah continuing to increase, Meer-Jaffier retired from Court to his residence in the country, from whence he transmitted dispatches to Colonel Clive, urging him to begin his march to Moorshedabad.

The

The Colonel seeing that the die was cast, and that they had already gone much too far unless they proceeded still farther, immediately put the whole army in motion, and with a just, though daring reliance on his own talents, and the valor of his troops, crossing the Ganges, he advanced to Plassey, within one day's march of the capital, where he found the Subah encamped with a force of seventy thousand men, in all the "pomp, pride, and circumstance," of Oriental magnificence. The number of elephants with their scarlet housings, the rich and variegated embroidery of their tents and standards, and the martial splendor of their cavalry parading over the field with their drawn swords glittering in the sun, made a grand and striking appearance. The Subah, feeble of mind and infirm of purpose, on the first intelligence of the march of the English army, had eagerly courted the support and assistance of Meer-Jaffier, whom he had, beyond all possibility of forgiveness, previously offended. A full and free pardon was granted to Meer-Jaffier, who, being introduced into the presence of the Subah, took a solemn oath upon the Koran that he would be his faithful soldier; and, in return, the Subah swore that he would never attempt the life of Meer-Jaffier. Though the army of the Subah was advantageously posted upon an eminence, Colonel Clive advanced at the head of his troops, consisting of little more than three thousand men, with great intrepidity to the attack. Such, on the other hand, was the distrust and secret despondency prevailing throughout the Asiatic army, that resistance seemed to be scarcely attempted. With the trifling loss of about seventy men a most decisive victory was gained—the camp, artillery, and stores of the enemy falling into the hands of the victors. Doubtful, perhaps, of the final event, and perplexed in the mazes of his own policy, Meer-Jaffier, who commanded the left wing of the Subah's army, took no part whatever in the action. But the English Commander, far from discovering any impolitic symptoms of resentment at his ambiguity of conduct, saluted him, with apparent complacency, Subah of the three provinces, and exhorted him to pursue his march to Moorshedabad at the head of his troops—engaging, without delay, to follow and support him with his whole force. Sou-Rajah-Dowla, who had fled with the foremost from the field of action, abandoned himself to despair; and on his arrival at Moorshebadad, after some tumultuous consultations and inconsistent resolutions, he disguised himself in the habit of a faquier, and left his palace in the dead of night, in order to seek for safety in obscurity. Meer-Jaffier, all obstacles to his advancement being now surmounted, was seated, with all the accustomed ceremonies of state, upon the Musnud; and acknowledged as Subah of Bengal by all the Rajahs and Omrahs of the kingdom: And the unhappy Sou-Rajah-

Rajah-Dowla being discovered in his flight, was put to death, imploring in vain for mercy, after a reign of fifteen months, by the express command of the son of the new Subah. In conformity to the treaty previously concluded with the English, this Prince paid into the treasury of the Company a crore of rupees*, as an indemnification for their losses at Calcutta, and ceded to them a considerable territory in the vicinity of that city. And thus was a revolution accomplished very marvellous in the eyes of the inhabitants of Bengal, who could not comprehend how the throne of Ali-Verdi-Khan could be subverted by an handful of foreign mercantile adventurers. The affairs of the Company being thus triumphantly re-established in the northern provinces of India, the watchful attention of the Supreme Council and of the military Commandants was again turned to the coast of Coromandel, where the French had taken advantage of the temporary diminution of force on the part of the English, to make themselves masters of Ingeram, Vizagapatam, and other subordinate settlements in that quarter: And being now strengthened with large reinforcements from Europe conducted by M. Lally, under convoy of a powerful squadron, commanded by M. d'Aché, they threatened the entire conquest of all the English possessions on that coast. Fort St. David's was first invested, which surrendered after a very short and feeble defence. The Rajah of Tanjore having distinguished himself as a zealous and faithful ally of the English, M. Lally marched into his dominions, and on the Rajah's refusal to advance the enormous sum of seventy-two lacks of rupees, demanded by the French General, he invested the city of Tanjore, which was so resolutely defended by the native troops of the Rajah, assisted by some European engineers, that M. Lally was compelled to raise the siege with considerable loss. He took possession however, in his retreat from Tanjore, of the city of Arcot, the residence of the Nabob Mahomed-Ali-Khan, without opposition; and, in the beginning of December 1758, he advanced with his whole force to Madras, to which he laid close siege. But the place being strongly fortified and plentifully provided, the garrison made an obstinate defence; and, on the arrival of a considerable reinforcement of troops and military stores, under the conduct of Captain Kempenfelt, in February (1759), M. Lally abandoned the attempt, and retired with precipitation to Arcot, extremely chagrined at the ill success of this enterprise. "I reckon, says he, in an intercepted confidential letter ter to his friend M. le Gret, that we shall, on our arrival at Pondicherry, endeavor to learn some other trade—this of war requires too much patience; were I judge of the point of honor of the Company's officers, I would break some of them like glass." This Commander was a man of impetuous courage, but capricious, passionate, proud, and opinionated. Vizagapatam and Masulipatam were, about this time, recovered from the French by a detachment under Colonel Ford. And Salabat-Zing, Subah of the Decan, perceiving the fortune of the war now visibly inclining to the English, made eager advances to the government of Madras; and a treaty was concluded with the Subah, by which he renounced his former alliance with France, and ceded the entire Circar of Masulipatam to the Company; and the English, on their part, engaged not to assist or protect the Subah's enemies. Colonel Coote, who now commanded in chief the Company's forces in the Carnatic, gained several advantages over M. Lally; and a general engagement taking place between the two armies near Wandewash, at the beginning of the year (1760), the French were defeated with the loss of their camp and cannon. Colonel Coote immediately undertook the siege, and effected the reduction, of Arcot. Several bloody but indecisive naval encounters intervened also, since the commencement of the preceding year, between M. d'Aché and and Admiral Pococke, the successor of Admiral Watfon, who had died soon after the re-capture of Calcutta; universally lamented and esteemed as a man of great professional skill, of firm integrity, and of untarnished honor.

* A crore is an hundred lacks of rupees, considerably exceeding one million sterling. Upon the whole, and on various pretences, not less than one million eight hundred thousand pounds sterling, exclusive of presents to individuals to an immense amount, was exacted from the new Subah on this occasion. A lack of rupees is estimated at about 11,500l.

After the defeat of Wandewash, M. Lally retreated to Pondicherry, where he was pursued with unremitting diligence by Colonel Coote, who, with the assistance of the British squadron, soon formed the complete blockade of that important city. As soon as the periodical rains abated, and the season for active operations recommenced, the blockade was converted into a regular siege; and the place, though defended with great vigor by M. Lally, was reduced to extremity before the end of January (1761), not so much from the damage sustained from the assaults of the besiegers, as from the excessive scarcity of provisions, which the temporary but critical absence of M. d'Aché, now repairing and careening his ships at Mauritius, left M. Lally wholly destitute of the means to remedy. The English squadron, however, being driven from their station by a violent tempest, he dispatched a letter to the French Resident at Pulicat, fortunately intercepted by the English, urging him, in the strongest terms, to exert himself in the procurement of supplies: "Lose not an instant, says he, in sending chelings upon chelings laden with rice. We are no longer blockaded by sea. The salvation salvation of Pondicherry depends upon you." The English Admiral, however, soon resuming his station, he lost all hope, and demanded a capitulation, which Colonel Coote would grant upon no other terms, than that of the garrison surrendering prisoners of war; to which M. Lally at length indignantly assented. Thus the proud and opulent capital of the French settlements in the East fell, by the fortune of war, into the hands of the enemy, nearly at the same time that the conquest of Canada was completed in the West; and the genius of England triumphed over that of France, at this propitious period, on both sides of the globe.

There yet remains to be investigated, another grand and essential branch of the memorable contest now under contemplation; that is to say the war in Germany, resumed with fresh vigor after a short interval, subsequent to the convention of Cloister-Seven. No sooner was the alliance concluded between the Courts of Vienna and Versailles, than it was communicated to the Court of Petersburg, and the Empress of Russia acceded to it without hesitation. Sweden also speedily became a party in the confederacy; though extremely opposite to the views and inclinations of the Monarch, who by the constitution of government, established after the death of Charles XII. possessed little more than the shadow of regal authority; the the King of Poland, Elector of Saxony, was deterred from following the example of Sweden, only by his vicinity to Prussia, and the bitter recollection of his former losses and sufferings.

Great military preparations, however, being made in all parts of the Austrian dominions, and the King of Prussia having received undoubted intelligence of negotiations which had been long secretly depending between the Courts of Vienna, Petersburg, and Dresden, extremely to his prejudice, and of which the dismemberment of his dominions was understood to be the ultimate object, ordered M. Klingraffe, his Minister at the Imperial Court, to demand of the Empress-Queen a positive and explicit declaration of her intentions. Count Kaunitz, by command of the Empress, replied in general terms, "That her Imperial Majesty had found it necessary, in the present juncture, to arm for her own defence, and that of her allies; but that her armaments did not tend to the prejudice of any person or state whatever." On the transmission of this answer, M. Klingraffe received fresh orders from the court of Berlin, to represent to the Empress, "That his Prussian Majesty was well acquainted with the secret hostile projects of the Imperial Courts; that he constituted the Empress arbiter of peace or war; that he would be satisfied with nothing less than an express assurance of peace; and that he would regard an ambiguous answer as a declaration of war." The Empress, in return, signified, in indignant terms, her astonishment at the memorial now presented. She said, that she had, in common with all other sovereigns, a right to take such measures as she deemed necessary for her safety, and that it belonged to none but herself to estimate her own danger; that no treaty of offensive alliance did exist, or had ever existed, between her and the Empress of the Russias; and that the positive assurance required of her, in terms so unusually peremptory, could not be more binding than the solemn treaty actually subsisting, and which she had no intention to violate."

The Prussian Monarch, firmly persuaded by evidence, transmitted through secret channels * of intel-

* Le Roi avoit un canal par lequel il tiroit, des avis certains sur les projets de ses ennemis qui étoient près d'éclater. C'étoit un commis de la Chancellerie Secrète de Dresde, qui remettoit toutes les Semaines au Ministre Prussien les dépêches que sa cour recevoit de Petersbourg et de Vienne, ainsi que la copie de tous les traités qu'il avoit trouvés dans les archives. Il parut par ses écrits que la Cour de Russie s'excusoit de ne pouvoir entreprendre la guerre cette année, à cause que sa flotte n'étoit pas en état d'entrer en mer. — La réponse du Comte Kaunitz se trouva conçue en termes équivoques et ambigus; mais il s'expliqua plus ouvertement avec le Comte de Flemming, Ministre du Roi de Pologne à Vienne, lequel rendit compte de cet entretien dans une relation à sa cour: La copie de cette dépêche fut envoyée incontinent de Dresde à Berlin; le Comte Flemming

intelligence, of the insincerity of the court of Vienna, and that Saxony waited only a favourable occasion openly to join the confederacy against him, entered that Electorate with a numerous army, and took possession of the city of Dresden on the 8th September 1756, declaring, however, that he did not mean to violate the neutrality professed by his Polish Majesty, and requiring only that monarch to separate his army into cantonments, as a proof and pledge of his amity and good faith. The King of Poland, astonished and exasperated at this unexpected intrusion, seemed neither to know how to comply or to resist. Relying, however, upon the strength of the inaccessible camp of Pirna, singularly and romantically situated, on the summit of a lofty range of rocks, extending along the banks of the Elbe, to which the Saxon army had retreated, he ventured to declare his resolution to keep his troops assembled for the defence and protection of his person and dominions. This, with an antagonist such as the King ming y dit, " Le Comte Kaunitz se propose d' inquiéter le Roi par ses réponses, et de le pousser à commettre les premières hostilités." Hist. de la Guerre de Sept Ans.—Count Hertzberg, however, in his Historic Memoir of the Reign of Frederic the Great, presumes to suggest a doubt whether that Monarch might not rely too confidently on this secret intelligence, and whether it was, or is, perfectly clear that the two Empresses had really formed a fixed and serious design for the subversion of the Electoral House of Brandenburg.

of

of Prussia, was equivalent to a declaration of war: And the Prussian General, finding it impossible to attack the Saxons, took immediate possession, by order of the King, of all the passes leading to this impregnable post; and the whole Saxon army, reduced to extremity by famine, was, on the 14th October, compelled to surrender prisoners of war. The King of Poland now retired for personal security to Warsaw, and the King of Prussia took possession, as a conquered country, of the whole Electorate. During the blockade of Pirna, that Monarch had made an attempt to penetrate into Bohemia; but finding the Austrian army, under Count Browne, strongly posted at Lowoschutz, on the Egra, a bloody engagement ensued, which terminated with nearly equal loss; but the advantage remained with the Austrians, as the King of Prussia was compelled to measure back his steps to Saxony, where he took up his winter-quarters.

The King of Prussia, on re-entering Dresden, commanded the royal cabinet to be forced, in defiance of the personal opposition of the Queen of Poland. In it was found deposited an authentic copy of a defensive treaty of alliance between the Courts of Vienna, Petersburg, and Dresden, which had been some years concluded, and which contained six secret articles. The fourth of these articles, for the sake of which the whole treaty seemed to be formed, imported that if the King of Prussia should depart from the peace of Dresden, which the contracting Powers declare their intention religiously to observe, by attacking either of the contracting Powers, or even the Republic of Poland, the rights of the Empress-Queen to Silesia, &c. shall again revive and be considered as in full force; and the eventual partition of the Prussian dominions should take place as stipulated in the treaty.

In consequence of these daring acts of violence, the King was, at the subsequent meeting of the Diet at Ratisbon, in his quality of Elector of Brandenburg, put under the ban of the empire, divested of his privileges and prerogatives, his fiefs escheated, and the Circles ordered to furnish their respective contingencies for carrying this sentence into execution. Not in the least intimidated by this formidable denunciation, that Monarch, early in the ensuing spring (1757), entered Bohemia, at the head of a vast army, assisted by the Mareschals Keith and Schwerin, and advancing towards Prague, found the Austrians, who were at least equally numerous, entrenched on the banks of the Moldaw, commanded by Prince Charles of Lorraine and Count Browne, whom he attacked without hesitation or delay—forcing the entrenchments with resistless intrepidity and complete success, though with the loss of the gallant Mareschal Schwerin, who, after surviving the dangers of fifty campaigns, was slain, slain, fighting at the head of his troops, covered with laurels, in the moment of victory. The shattered remains of the Austrian army took refuge in the city of Prague, where Mareschal Browne soon after died of the wounds which he received in the battle, or rather of the chagrin occasioned by the loss of it. The Prussians immediately formed the investment of that city, which, in consequence of the vast number inclosed within the walls, was quickly reduced, by famine, to the last extremity of distress.

At this critical period, the famous Leopold Count Daun, originally a subaltern officer serving in the school of the great Khevenhuller, who with the penetrating eye of military sagacity, marked his extraordinary talents, and predicted his future eminence, was appointed to the chief command of the Imperial armies. This General immediately prepared for the relief of Prague, by collecting troops from all quarters; and reinforcing them by numerous levies, he encamped with this new army in an almost impregnable situation at Kolin, near Prague, in order to harass and retard the operations of the siege. The King of Prussia, impatient of molestation, and elated with success, formed the rash resolution of attacking Mareschal Daun in his camp; but, after repeated efforts, he was finally repulsed with prodigious slaughter. The siege of Prague was immediately raised in consequence of this disaster, and Bohemia evacuated.

The King of Prussia now found his prospects darkening on every side. The French army, under the Duc de Richelieu, who, with merit very inferior, had superseded Mareschal D'Estrées in the command, had penetrated into the Electorate of Brandenburg, taken Halberstadt, and laid a great extent of territory under contribution. Mareschal Apraxin, at the head of one hundred thousand Russians, had entered Ducal Prussia, where they committed the most enormous excesses. Pomerania was menaced with a powerful invasion from Sweden. The army of the Empire, reinforced by a strong body of troops under the Prince of Soubise, had entered Lusatia. The victorious Austrians, after laying close siege to Schweidnitz, the key of Silesia, ravaged the whole country; General Haddick, at the head of a numerous detachment, carrying terror even to the gates of Berlin. It was at this period that the King of Prussia thus expressed himself, in a letter to his friend the celebrated Earl Mareschal: "What say you of this league, which has only the Marquis of Brandenburg for its object? The Great Elector would be surprised to see his grandson at war with the Russians, the Swedes, the Austrians, almost all Germany, and a hundred thousand French auxiliaries. I know not whether it will be disgrace in me to submit; but

but I am sure there will be no glory in vanquishing me."

The Russian army, after reducing Memel, and leaving the country behind them a perfect waste, reached the frontiers of Germany in August; but were soon after unexpectedly attacked in their camp at Norkitten, by Mareschal Lehwald, who commanded on that side: And, though that General was finally obliged to desist, the Russians sustained immense loss, and they soon afterwards made a precipitate retreat from the Prussian territories. In the mean time the King of Prussia, and Mareschal Keith, engaging the combined forces of France and the Empire, at Rosbach, Nov. 5 (1757), commanded by Soubize, gained a complete victory, with inconsiderable loss. But this victory by no means extricated him from his difficulties. The Austrians, headed by Mareschal Daun, had taken Schweidnitz, and laid siege to Breslaw, and, on the 22d November, forced, after an obstinate resistance, the entrenchments of the army under the Prince of Bevern, posted near that place. Breslaw immediately surrendered on capitulation. The King of Prussia, on the news of this misfortune, instantly marched to the relief of Silesia; and, coming up with the Austrians at Lissa, the two armies joined battle with inconceivable fury. Notwithstanding the military conduct and personal bravery displayed by Count Daun, on this occasion, the Ausstrians were totally defeated with the loss of twenty thousand men. Breslaw opened its gates to the victors; and the whole province, excepting Schweidnitz, fell once more into the hands of the Prussians.

The sudden retreat of the Russians, which was better to be accounted for from political than military causes, left Marechal Lehwald at liberty to act against the Swedes, who had advanced into Prussian Pomerania, and were preparing to lay siege to Stetin; but on the appearance of the Prussian army, they not only evacuated the towns they had captured, but retreated with precipitation into Swedish Pomerania, where they were followed by Lehwald, who drove them from one post to another, till nothing remained to them at the end of the campaign but the city of Stralsund. Such was the situation of the King of Prussia, when it was determined by the English Minister, that the army of observation, scattered and dispersed by the Convention of Cloister-Seven, should resume their arms; for which the excesses committed by the French troops in the Electorate, gave them a very fair and plausible pretext.

Mr. Pitt was not ignorant or insensible to the charge of inconsistency, which he well knew would be advanced against him with all the force of truth, if not of eloquence, on this occasion: But very powerful reasons now influenced this Minister to act in contradiction to that general system of policy which he had uniformly avowed and defended. The King of England, retaining all his partiality for German politics, and yielding only to the necessity of the times, had Mr. Pitt continued inflexible, would doubtless have embraced the first favorable opportunity of again dismissing a Minister, who might not again be able to reinstate himself with the same eclat. But a consideration of still greater weight, it may be presumed, with Mr. Pitt, was, the visible change of sentiment in the nation at large, on this subject. The King of Prussia, since the dissolution of his political connection with France, and his consequent alliance with England, had become a very popular character in that country; and this national predilection, after the victory of Rossbach, rose to enthusiasm. That Monarch artfully affected to consider the union of the two great Catholic powers, as a combination to oppress and subvert the Protestant interest in the Empire; and the people of England, to whom the name of Popery was still formidable, delighted to applaud and extol this sceptred infidel, as THE PROTESTANT HERO. Their feelings and principles were, at this crisis, equally interested. The national honor was concerned to efface the stain of the ignominious convention of Cloister-Seven, by which an army had been annihilated.
act

The ingratitude of the Queen of Hungary, whose obligations to England were of a nature and magnitude never to be forgotten, was the favorite theme of indignant declamation: Whilst the courage, the talents, the successes of the King of Prussia excited an involuntary admiration and partiality in the breast even of those whose better judgment led them to condemn the whole tenor of his political conduct, as proceeding from a spirit of lawless and unprincipled ambition. It was not possible for Mr. Pitt to act with feebleness and indecision; and, if he resolved to engage in a Germanic war, which, after the alliance concluded with Prussia, seemed a sort of necessary appendage to the general system *, he would at the same time resolve to prosecute it with vigor and effect. This Minister discerned also the advantage which might eventually arise to the distant and multifarious

* "Is it possible, said his Prussian Majesty, in an expostulatory letter addressed at this crisis to the King of England, that your Majesty can have so little fortitude and constancy, as to be dispirited by a small reverse of fortune? Are affairs so ruinous that they cannot be repaired? I hope your Majesty will consider the step you have made me hazard, and remember you are the sole cause of those misfortunes that now impend over my head. I should never have abandoned the alliance with France, but for your flattering assurances. I do not now repent of the treaty I have concluded with your Majesty; but I expect you will not ingloriously leave me at the mercy of my enemies, after having brought upon me all the force of Europe."

operations

operations of Great Britain, from fixing the chief attention of France upon an object which, from local circumstances, must be at all times more interesting and important to that kingdom than to England. And he scrupled not, at a distant and subsequent period, to affirm, that "AMERICA had been conquered in GERMANY." And, upon the whole, it must perhaps be admitted, that the vast superiority of force maintained by France in Germany, and which was attended with no real or permanent advantage, was the principal cause of her invariable inferiority in almost all other parts.

The disbanded army being actually re-assembled at Stade, in November 1757, the command of it was conferred upon Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, brother to the reigning Duke. This able General immediately put his troops in motion, and though the season was so far advanced, he obtained several advantages over the enemy. Two considerable detachments from the French army were entirely defeated by Generals Schuylenburg and Zastrow, the town and castle of Harbourg reduced, and the cities of Lunenburg and Zell recovered; after which the two armies went into winter-quarters. In the course of the ensuing spring, the famous subsidy treaty was concluded between Great Britain and Prussia, by which the King of England engaged to pay into the hands of his Prussian Majesty the annual sum of 670,000*l.* or four millions millions of German crowns, to be employed at his discretion for the good of the common cause. This great supply enabled that Monarch to take the field with redoubled force. In April 1758, he opened the trenches before Schweidnitz, and kept a continual fire upon the town, with a prodigious train of artillery, consisting of three hundred pieces of cannon and eighty mortars. The garrison were obliged to surrender upon capitulation, before the end of the month. The Austrian army, after the battle of Lissa, having retired into Bohemia, the King of Prussia levied immense contributions in Saxony, Pomerania, and Mecklenburg.

About the middle of February 1758, Prince Ferdinand put himself at the head of the allies, and advancing towards the French army, which retired at his approach, took possession of Bremen without opposition. The Duc de Richelieu was now succeeded in the command by the Count de Clermont, who found his troops reduced, by the accidents of war, and a variety of hardships, to a most deplorable condition. Under these circumstances he determined to march back to the Rhine with all expedition. In consequence of this resolution, Hanover was evacuated, after having been in the possession of the French about six months. The Duc de Randan, Governor of that city, for his Most Christian Majesty, gained the highest honor by the generosity, rectitude, and humanity of
of

of his conduct, for which he received the formal and grateful acknowledgements of the regency of the Electorate. Such was the precipitation of the enemy's retreat, and so great their confusion and embarrassment, that they were obliged to abandon their sick and wounded to the mercy of the allies, who also took many prisoners, with several entire magazines of provision and forage, which they had not time to destroy.

The Count de Clermont having at length reached the farther borders of the Rhine, was still closely pursued by Prince Ferdinand, who passed that river in the beginning of June; and, on the 23d of that month, attacked the French army posted at Crevelt, the left wing of which, after a warm engagement, was defeated with the loss of six thousand men; but the right and centre made a skilful and regular retreat. The Count de Gisors, only son of the Marechal Duc de Belleisle, and one of the most accomplished noblemen of the French Court, fell in this action. Prince Ferdinand immediately invested Dusseldorp, which soon surrendered on capitulation. At this period the Count de Clermont was succeeded by Marechal de Contades, who being joined by powerful reinforcements, menaced an attack upon the Prince in his turn; and the Prince of Ysemburg, who commanded a separate corps on the other side the Rhine, being about this time defeated by Marechal

Mareschal Broglio, his Serene Highness thought it necessary to repass that river, as well in order to support the vanquished army, as to meet the reinforcements from England, commanded by the Duke of Marlborough, which were now landed at Embden. Accordingly a bridge was thrown over the river at Griethuysen, and the Allies passed it on the tenth of August without loss. The season was so far advanced previous to the junction with the British forces, that no military operations of importance ensued during the remainder of the campaign between the two grand armies on the Rhine. On the Weser, the Prince of Ysemburg was again worsted by Soubize and Broglio. Prince Ferdinand now entered into winter-quarters at Munster, and the French again established themselves in Westphalia.

During these transactions the King of Prussia had his hands fully employed in Saxony and Bohemia. After the reduction of Schweidnitz, he began his march at the head of fifty thousand men into Moravia, and laid siege to Olmütz, the capital of that Marquisate. Mareschal Daun immediately advanced to its relief, and, though he did not think proper to hazard a battle, he posted himself in so judicious a situation, that the Prussians found it extremely difficult to carry on their operations, being themselves kept in perpetual alarm. The garrison also made several successful sallies, and the Austrian

General

General having at length intercepted a great convoy of provisions and ammunition, the King of Prussia found himself under an absolute necessity of raising the siege, which he effected with such secrecy and expedition as to have penetrated far into Bohemia, before it was known in the Austrian camp that he had lost sight of the walls of Olmutz. Mareschal Daun immediately followed the Prussian Monarch into Bohemia, but found himself without an antagonist, his Majesty having evacuated that kingdom at the approach of the Russians, who had now entered Brandenburg in two large bodies, commanded by Generals Fermor and Browne, and spread terror and devastation wherever they appeared. A detail of the outrages perpetrated by these northern barbarians cannot be read, or related, without horror. In the course of this campaign, they plundered and destroyed fourteen large towns, and more than one hundred villages. The Prussians came up with them at Zorndorf, August 25*, when a desperate engagement ensued. The battle began about noon, and lasted till night, when the Russians gave way in great confusion. As the Prussians gave no quarter, the slaughter was terrible. Notwithstanding this defeat, the Russians continued extremely formidable. Upon the retreat of the King of Prussia from Bohemia, Mareschal Daun had advanced towards the Elbe, and, being joined by the Prince of Deux Ponts at the head of the army of the Empire, threatened to surround Prince Henry of Prussia, who commanded with much reputation and ability for the King his brother in Saxony: But his force was too weak to stop the progress of the Austrians, who took Konigstein, and established themselves in the strong camp at Pirna. Immediately after the battle of Zorndorf, the King began his march to join the Prince; but, upon his arrival, found the Imperialists so strongly entrenched, that they could not be attacked with any prospect of success. However, he gained some trifling advantages, and dislodged a corps of troops posted in the village of Hochkirchen, which was immediately occupied by the Prussian army. But, in the middle of the night of the fourteenth of October, he was suddenly surprised in his camp by Mareschal Daun; and, after a most severe and bloody conflict, maintained amidst all the horrors of darkness and confusion, he was obliged to leave the Austrians in possession of the field and camp. Mareschal Keith gloriously fell in the action. The Prussian Monarch, on this misfortune, retiring into Silesia, the Austrians invested Dresden. On their appearance, the Prussian Governor Schmettau set fire to the beautiful suburbs of that city. The King of Prussia, in his answer to the Saxon memorial presented to the Diet on this subject, affected to feel the utmost distress and compassion at the situation of the inhabitants; and and lamented, in the most pathetic terms, that the necessities of war rendered unavoidable a measure so repugnant to those principles of philanthropy which glowed in his royal breast. His Prussian Majesty, after putting a stop to the progress of the Austrian arms in Silesia, and raising the sieges of Neisse and Cosel, returned to the relief of Dresden more formidable than ever, being joined by a strong body of troops, under the Generals Dohna and Wedel, the former of whom had been engaged in observing the motions of the Russians, who had by this time, after attempting the siege of Colberg without success, retired beyond the Vistula. The latter had opposed the Swedes in Pomerania. The campaign in that province greatly resembled that of the last year; for the Prussian Monarch being obliged to withdraw all his forces excepting those in garrison, the enemy not only recovered every thing they had lost, but made bold incursions into the Prussian territories, and even levied contributions within twenty miles of Berlin: But, at the approach of General Wedel, they evacuated their conquests with great precipitation, and their possessions in Pomerania at the end of the campaign were once more reduced to the city of Stralsund. The Prussian General being now at liberty to co-operate with the King, marched into Saxony, and raised the siege of Torgau; and, being afterwards joined by General Dohna, proceeded to the relief of Leipzig, which was closely invested by the army of the Empire; and this design being happily completed, they effected a junction with the King, and advanced towards Dresden; but, at their approach, Mareschal Daun thought proper to draw off his forces, and, on the twentieth of November, his Prussian Majesty entered that city in triumph: And thus ended the campaign of 1758.

* A. D. 1758.

The French began the next year with an act of singular perfidy, in seizing the Imperial city of Francfort, which, indeed, was productive of the most important advantages, as it commanded the navigation both of the Maine and the Rhine; and here the Prince of Soubize established his headquarters.

Early in the spring, several officers of rank in the allied army distinguished themselves by their activity and courage in beating up the enemy's quarters, destroying their magazines, and defeating various detached corps, particularly the Hereditary Prince, who, in an action at Meinungen, made three entire battalions prisoners of war: But the General of the Allies was disappointed in his grand design of driving the French army from Francfort before the arrival of their expected reinforcements. With this intention, he made, on the 13th of April, an attack on Mareschal Broglie at Bergen; but, being repulsed in three different assaults, he was obliged at length to retreat with loss—the brave

brave but unfortunate Prince of Ysemburg fell in the action. In consequence of this check, Prince Ferdinand returning to his former cantonments in Munster, the French army, now under the command of Marechal Contades, advanced northwards and took possession of Cassel, and Gottingen, Lipstadt, Munster, and Minden. The regency of Hanover, alarmed at the rapidity of their progress, sent off the archives of the Electorate, and the most valuable effects, to Stade, in order to be shipped for England: And his Serene Highness finding himself unable to oppose them in the field, encamped with his troops in a strong situation near Minden, where, on the first of August, the French General resolved to attack them. This resolution produced the famous battle of Minden. The French charged with great impetuosity, but met with so warm a reception, that, after a conflict which lasted from dawn of day till noon, they were broken and routed on all sides, and gave way in extreme disorder and confusion. At this critical moment, the Prince sent orders to Lord George Sackville, who commanded the cavalry of the right wing, which formed a corps de reserve, to advance with all possible expedition to the attack; and, had these orders been properly executed, the disorderly retreat of the French army must have been converted into a precipitate flight; but his Lordship unfortunately not deeming his Highness's ordets sufficiently explicit; chose to apply to the Prince in person for an explanation; by which means, as well as by repeated orders to halt after the march was actually begun, so much time was lost that the cavalry did not arrive soon enough to be of the least service. The allied army, however, without his Lordship's assistance, obtained a glorious victory. The English infantry, in particular, commanded by Generals Waldegrave and Kingsley, acquired immortal honor, not only sustaining, with the utmost intrepidity, the repeated attacks made upon them, but, charging the enemy in their turn, totally broke and routed the gendarmerie, carabineers, and the choicest veterans of the French army. In this action M. Contades lost ten thousand men, together with forty-three pieces of large cannon, a great number of colors and standards, and his own equipage and cabinet, containing papers of the utmost consequence. The garrison of Minden immediately surrendered at discretion. The very same day, a separate corps, under the Duc de Brissac, was totally defeated at Coveltdt by the Hereditary Prince. The French army now began its retreat to Cassel, which they soon abandoned, and fell back to Gießen, being exceedingly harassed during their march, and suffering much damage. The city of Munster was now the only place in Westphalia which remained in the hands of the French. After in vain attempting to reduce it by a bombardment and cannonade, the Allies invested it in form about the beginning of November, when it surrendered upon capitulation.

The Duc de Broglie had by this time assumed the command of the French army, M. Contades being recalled with some marks of disgrace. The military talents of the new General had, in the course of the war, appeared very conspicuous; but all his efforts to retrieve the superiority lost by the defeat of his predecessor at Minden proved ineffectual, and he would, in all probability, have been driven beyond the Rhine, had not the exigency of the King of Prussia's situation made it necessary to detach the Hereditary Prince into Saxony, with a large body of troops to his assistance. That heroic Monarch had experienced the usual inconstancy of fortune in this campaign, though it was opened with great eclat by Prince Henry, who, forcing a passage into Bohemia by way of Peterwald, destroyed the Austrian magazines at Leutmeritz, and from thence penetrating into Franconia, drove the army of the Empire before him to Nuremberg, laid the country under contribution, and captured upwards of fifteen hundred prisoners. In the mean time, General Wedel had been sent into Poland to oppose the progress of the Russians, who had begun their march from the banks of the Vistula; but, in an obstinate engagement which took place at Kaye near Zullichau, the Prussians were defeated with great loss. The enemy immediately advanced into Brandenburg, and made themselves masters of the important city of Francfort upon the Oder. The King of Prussia, extremely alarmed at their success, ordered a detachment of ten thousand men from the grand camp in Silesia to join the army under General Wedel, who had been also reinforced by about the same number under General Finck; and the King took upon himself the command of the whole, amounting to fifty thousand men. The Russians, to the number of eighty thousand, were strongly entrenched at Cunerisdorf; but the King's affairs requiring a desperate effort, he determined to attack them in their camp, and, about eleven in the morning of the twelfth of August*, the action was begun with an heavy cannonade; after which the Prussians charged the left wing of the Russian army with so much vigor, that, after a furious contest of six hours, they forced the entrenchments with great slaughter, and seventy pieces of cannon fell into their hands. The battle was now looked upon as decided, and the King, in the first transports of his joy, dispatched the following billet to the Queen at Berlin: "Madam, we have driven the Russians from their entrenchments—in two hours more expect to hear of a glorious victory." But he soon found himself fatally mistaken. The Russian General Soltikoff exerting all his powers, rallied his troops upon an eminence under cover of a redoubt; and his artillery, which was still greatly superior to that of the Prussians, was planted so judiciously as to render his situation almost impregnable. However, the King was resolved to hazard a fresh attack, though against the advice of all his Generals. His infantry being repulsed in repeated assaults, the cavalry were ordered to succeed to the charge, but with no better success. At length the Russian cavalry, and a body of twelve thousand Austrian horse, under M. Laudohn, who had joined Soltikoff just before the engagement, and had hitherto remained inactive, seeing the Prussians discouraged and exhausted, fell in amongst them sword in hand with such fury, that, in a short time, the Prussians were totally routed and dispersed, notwithstanding the extraordinary efforts of the King, who exposed his life in the hottest parts of the engagement, had two horses shot under him, and his clothes shattered with musket balls. Nothing but the approach of night could have saved him from total ruin. On leaving the field of battle, he dispatched a second billet to the Queen, expressed in these terms: "Remove from Berlin with the royal family. Let the archives be carried to Potzdam. The town may make conditions with the enemy." This was by far the most bloody action that had happened since the commencement of hostilities. Thirty thouland men were left dead on the field, of whom two-thirds were Prussians. No less than twelve Generals were killed or wounded in this engagement, and the King of Prussia left his whole train of artillery in the hands of the Russians. This, however, was soon replaced from the arsenal at Berlin; and by his indefatigable diligence in recruiting his army, which was farther strengthened by the recal of General Kleist from Pomerania, he soon retrieved his importance.

* 1759.

During these transactions, Prince Henry had gained several advantages over the army of the Empire, which again entering Saxony, had taken possession of the city of Dresden; and also over the Austrian army co-operating with them under General Haddick. The Prince being at length joined by his Prussian Majesty, General Finck was detached with a strong body of forces to cut off the retreat of the Austrians into Bohemia. But this measure proved a most unfortunate one; for Marshal Daun receiving intelligence of General Finck's remote and isolated position, immediately resolved upon an assault: And dividing his forces into four columns, he conducted his march with such secrecy and expedition, that the Prussians found themselves entirely surrounded before they had entertained the least suspicion of being attacked. In this emergency, they fought with great bravery; but at length, overpowered by numbers and destitute of the possibility of relief, they were compelled to surrender prisoners of war to the amount of 19 battalions and 35 squadrons. It was at this critical period that the Prussian Monarch was joined by the Hereditary Prince, without whose assistance it was feared he would have found himself unable any longer to cope with such numerous and powerful adversaries. The approach of winter at last freed him from any farther apprehensions from the Russians, who retired into their old quarters in Poland. As to the Swedes, they had fortunately been extremely inactive during the whole campaign, and after some idle and fruitless excursions, had retreated as usual into the neighbourhood of Stralsund.
destitute

In spite of all his losses, the King of Prussia still kept his ground in Saxony; and even his enemies could not help expressing their admiration of that heroic fortitude and invincible perseverance which supported him amidst all the dangers and difficulties of a situation, by universal acknowledgement, unparalleled in the annals of Europe.

The Court of Versailles had made great preparations for a vigorous campaign in Westphalia the ensuing summer*. The grand army, under Marschal Broglie, was reinforced to the number of one hundred thousand men; and the Count de St. Germaine commanded a separate corps of about thirty thousand. The Hereditary Prince, who had rejoined the allied army early in the spring (1760), met with a mortifying repulse at Corbach, in a too adventurous assault upon the Count de St. Germaine; but he had soon an opportunity of retrieving his honor at Exdorf, where, on the sixteenth of July, he attacked a numerous body of the enemy under General Glaubitz, who were totally defeated after a very warm action, five whole battalions being taken prisoners, including the Commander, with their arms, baggage, and artillery. Elliot's regiment of light-horse appeared, for the first time, in the field upon this occasion; and, to the astonishment of the veteran troops, charged five different times, and broke through the enemy at every charge. This advantage was succeeded by another of still greater consequence; for the Chevalier Muiy, who commanded the reserve of the French army, amounting to thirty-five thousand men, being ordered to pass the Dymel, with a view to cut off the communication of the allied army, then posted near Cassel, with Westphalia, Prince Ferdinand immediately decamped and followed him; and, on the thirty-first of July, made so masterly a disposition of his forces, that M. de Muiy, who then lay encamped near the village of Warbourg, found himself at once attacked in flank, front, and rear. The French retreated so precipitately, that the English infantry could not arrive in time to have any share in the action; but the cavalry, with the Marquis of Granby

* 1760.

Granby at their head, distinguished themselves in the most honorable manner. The General of the Allies, however, being obliged, in consequence of this movement, to leave the Landgraviate of Hesse exposed to the enemy's attack, Mareschal Broglio made himself master of Cassel, and even reduced Munden, Gottingen, and Elmbeck, in the Electorate of Hanover. Notwithstanding the capture of these towns, the superiority acquired by the late victory enabled the English General to detach the Hereditary Prince on an expedition to the Lower Rhine, which was by no means productive of the advantages expected from it. The city of Cleves, being weakly garrisoned, made little resistance; but at Wesel, which place he next invested, he met with a much warmer reception than he looked for; and his operations also being much retarded by heavy rains, he found it impracticable to carry the place before the arrival of a very superior force, detached from the French army, under M. de Castries, for its relief. The siege being raised, an engagement ensued near Campen, in which the Prince sustained considerable loss; notwithstanding which, he repassed the river in the face of the enemy without molestation, and rejoined the main army, which had been ineffectually employed in the blockade of Gottingen; soon after which, Prince Ferdinand retired into winter-quarters, leaving the enemy in possession.

possession of the whole country eastward of the Weser.

The King of Prussia, on his part, had made surprising exertions during the whole of this campaign. Whilst the two grand hostile armies remained strongly entrenched in the neighbourhood of Dresden, General Laudohn made great progress in the reduction of Silesia, by defeating a strong body of troops under General Fouquet, and taking the important town of Glatz, which contained an immense magazine of military stores; after which he invested Breslau. But Count Tavenstein the governor, by making a most resolute defence, gave opportunity to Prince Henry, of marching to its relief. Such was the expedition of the Prussian General, that he marched one hundred and thirty English miles in five days, and at his approach Laudohn abandoned his enterprize, after laying the city in ashes by a furious cannonade and bombardment, by which he hoped to intimidate the governor to a surrender. The King of Prussia himself, after besieging in vain the city of Dresden, marched into Silesia, whither he was followed by Count Daun; and advancing to Lignitz, with a view to effect a junction with the Prince, who still remained at Breslau, he found himself in imminent danger of being surrounded, Marschal Daun being posted in front, General Laudohn on his left, and General Laschy on his right; the grand

grand army of the Russians, under Marechal Sol-tikoff, being also on their march to co-operate with the Austrians. In this emergency he determined rather to give battle than wait the attack; and, after taking the necessary precautions for the safety of his camp, he made a movement to the left with the greater part of his forces, in the evening of the 14th of August *, with an intention of surprizing General Laudohn, who, in consequence of a plan formed by Marechal Daun, of which his Prussian Majesty had obtained previous intimation, was at the very same time on his march, to surprize the King. The two armies met about two o'clock in the morning, between the villages of Pfaffendorff and Lignitz, and after a very sharp action, which lasted till six, the Austrians gave ground, and were pursued to a considerable distance: But Marechal Daun, who, in the execution of his part of the plan, had marched to the right of the Prussian camp, finding the tents apparently deserted, and hearing the remote reverberation of cannon, instantly conjectured the nature of the King's manœuvre, and hastened, but in vain, to the relief of Laudohn, the Austrians being previously and totally routed.

By this victory the King opening himself a passage to Breslau, joined his brother Prince Henry, at Neumarcke, and they immediately began their

* 1760.

march

march to Schweidnitz, now closely blockaded by the Austrians, who retired at their approach with some precipitation to the mountains of Landshut. But while the King and Prince triumphed in Silesia, General Hullen, who had been left in Saxony, found great difficulty in maintaining his ground against the Imperial army, under the Prince of Deux-Ponts. And the Swedes, who had surprized and killed General Manteuffe in the beginning of the year, now ravaged all Pomerania, without meeting any opposition. But the sufferings of the Pomeranians were inconsiderable in comparison of those which the Electorate of Brandenburg, and even the city of Berlin itself, experienced: For a grand detachment of the Russian army, under Count Czernicheff, penetrating into the Marche on one side, and a numerous body of Austrians, under the Generals Lascey and Brentano, on the other, joined their forces in the neighbourhood of that capital, which being of great extent, and imperfectly fortified, could make but a very feeble resistance; the garrison, to the amount of twelve hundred men, being compelled to surrender themselves prisoners of war. The Russian and Austrian troops no sooner entered the place than they demanded the immediate payment of eight hundred thousand guilders, and afterwards exacted a contribution of one million nine hundred thousand German crowns.

march

These

These exorbitant impositions the inhabitants were obliged to comply with, in order to save the city from total destruction. However, neither their compliance, nor the united efforts of the Austrian and Russian Generals, could prevent the Cossacks, Croats, and other irregular troops, from being guilty of the most atrocious excesses. Not contented with demolishing the public magazines, arsenals, founderies, and hospitals, many hundred private houses were broke into and plundered, during the few days they remained there; for, upon hearing that the King was in full march to the relief of his capital, they abandoned the city, and taking different routes, they laid the whole country desolate in their retreat. The havock made by them in the royal castle of Charlottenburg would have disgraced an army of Goths and Vandals. The rich and costly furniture of that splendid palace was totally destroyed; and even the celebrated collection of paintings and statues, made by the Cardinal de Polignac, and deposited in this place, was miserably despoiled and disfigured. The King was followed by Mareschal Daun, at the head of one hundred thousand men. The Prussian army, after the junction with General Hullen, amounted to eighty thousand. Notwithstanding this inferiority, the King determined to risque a battle; and indeed the situation of his affairs seemed to render some desperate effort necessary: For at this time time General Laudohn was at the head of a numerous army in Silesia, and the Russians, who still threatened Breslau, had actually laid siege to Colberg, whilst the Prince of Deux-Ponts, at the head of the army of the Empire, being joined by General Laschy, had made himself master of Saxony, and the Swedes continued their ravages, uncontrolled, in Pomerania.

On the 3d day of November*, the whole Prussian army advanced towards the Austrians, advantageously posted at Torgau, upon the banks of the Elbe, their front being fortified with two hundred pieces of cannon; but the King giving his troops to understand that they had no alternative but to conquer or die, they charged the enemy with the most desperate intrepidity. The victory, however, remained in suspense, till General Zeithen, who had taken a circuit with part of the right wing of the Prussians, fell upon the rear of the Austrian army, which then began to give way, in some disorder; but Mareschal Daun receiving a dangerous wound, which obliged him to quit the field, the confusion became general. The darkness of the night, however, favored the retreat of the Austrians across the Elbe, over which they had previously thrown three bridges of boats, leaving the field of battle dearly purchased in the hands of the enemy. In consequence of this defeat, Mareschal Daun being under the necessity of recalling his detachments,

* 1760.

General Laudohn abandoned Landshut, and his other acquisitions in Silesia. The Russians also, at the approach of winter, which the King styled his best auxiliary, raised the siege of Colberg, and retired to their cantonments in Poland, the Swedes into their old quarters near Stralsund, and the Imperialists into Franconia; so that the King of Prussia found himself nearly in the same situation as at the beginning of the campaign. That Monarch was deservedly regarded both by friends and foes, as a prodigy of fortitude, genius, and courage; but his uncommon abilities only served to prolong the war, and the inhabitants of the Empire at large, who would have been happy had any decisive advantage been gained on either side, could now see no prospect of an end to their calamities.

Early in the spring of 1761, Prince Ferdinand opened the campaign with the sieges of Ziegenhayn and Cassel, hoping to reduce them before Marechal Broglio should receive his reinforcements; but the garrisons making a vigorous resistance, and part of the allied army under the Hereditary Prince being defeated near Heimbach, his Serene Highness found himself obliged to withdraw his troops and stand upon the defensive. The army under Marechal Broglio being at length recruited, and in a condition to take the field, Prince Ferdinand retired behind the Dymel, and established established his head-quarters at Paderborn. The Duc de Broglie having passed that river in June, drove General Sporcken from the post he occupied on the left side, and made himself master of Warbourg and Paderborn, and compelled Prince Ferdinand to retire behind the Lippe. On the 15th July, in the evening, the French army made a furious attack upon the left wing of the allies posted at Fellinghausen, commanded by the Marquis of Granby, and being repulsed with considerable loss, they renewed the attack at dawn of day with redoubled vigor; but finding that no impression could be made by their repeated efforts, their ardor began to abate: And at length, upon being charged by the Marquis in his turn, with great spirit, they abandoned the field in confusion, leaving behind them four thousand men dead on the spot.

Immediately after this action, the French Generals divided their forces; the Prince de Soubise retreating to Dortmund, and Mareschal Broglie marching back to Cassel. In a short time that General passed the Weser, with an intention of penetrating into the Electorate of Hanover; but on the approach of Prince Ferdinand he repassed that river with the greater part of his army: However, a detachment, under the command of the Count de Broglie his brother, by a forced march, took possession of Wolfenbüttele, and invested Brunswick;

wick; but the Hereditary Prince, flying to the relief of his father's capital, obliged the besiegers to relinquish this enterprize. For the rest of the campaign Mareschal Broglie remained inactive in his camp, and Prince Ferdinand not being able to force him to a battle, retired into winter cantonments in the vicinity of Munster and Osnaburg.

The spring * was far advanced before hostilities commenced in Saxony and Silesia. Wariness and caution seemed to succeed to that spirit of enterprize and activity which had so long prevailed. The grand armies, on each side, were so strongly posted that neither chose to risque the attack. The Imperialists, attempting to enter Saxony, were repulsed by General Seydlitz; but a numerous body of Russians, commanded by General Romanzoff, could not be prevented from penetrating into Pomerania, in July, and investing Colberg by land, whilst it was blocked up by a powerful squadron at sea. Their main army was soon after put in motion, and all the efforts of his Prussian Majesty could not prevent its junction with Laudohn; and now the ruin of that Monarch was again confidently predicted. If any event could make his affairs apparently more desperate, it was the loss of Schweidnitz, which General, now Mareschal Laudohn, surpris'd about this time, by a very brilliant coup de main. Prince Henry of Prussia, who commanded in Saxony, by an uncommon display of military skill, prevented Marechal Daun, who was at the head of a much superior army, from obtaining any advantage; that General was even obliged, in an attempt to storm the Prussian camp, to retreat with considerable loss, soon after which both armies were distributed into quarters of cantonment.

* 1761.

The fatal consequences which had been apprehended from the so much dreaded junction of the Austrian and Russian armies, did not however take place, and the Russian General soon perceived, or at least asserted, the necessity of separating, in order to cover his magazines in Poland, which were vigorously attacked by a large detachment from the Prussian army under General Platen. But the siege of Colberg still continued with unabating ardor. General Romanzoff seemed even to set the winter at defiance, and, in the prosecution of his design, gave early proofs of those great talents which have since rendered his name so illustrious. At length the place surrendered, Dec. 17 (1761), a conquest of singular importance, as it enabled the Court of St. Petersburg, at all times, to send supplies and reinforcements to their armies in Germany by sea; and the Russian General established his head-quarters in Pomerania, during the winter, with a view of taking the field early in the ensuing spring.

The

The French Court resolving to exert their utmost efforts in Westphalia, assembled a vast army upon the banks of the Weser (A. D. 1762), under the Prince de Soubise and the Count d'Estreés. Prince Ferdinand lay encamped behind the Dymel, watching their motions and waiting the favorable moment for an attack. At length, on the 24th June, the enemy being then posted at Grabenstein, a disposition was made for that purpose; the Prince himself crossing the river to charge in front, and Generals Luckner and Sporcken being severally detached to fall upon them at the same time in flank and rear. This plan was executed with such success, that the French army was thrown into the utmost confusion; and the French Generals, after a short resistance, gave orders for striking the tents, and founding a retreat; but such was the impetuosity of the assailants, that in all probability a total defeat would have ensued, had not Mons. de Stainville, with the most heroic gallantry and presence of mind, collected some regiments, consisting of the flower of the French infantry, with which he made so resolute a stand at the pass of Wilhemsthal, that he effectually covered the retreat of the two Marshals, who retired without much loss under the cannon of Cassel; but the corps under his command was either cut to pieces, or taken prisoners. The Marquis of Granby, who commanded the reserve of the allied army, and was closely engaged with Stainville, distinguished himself in a remarkable manner. In consequence of this defeat, the French Generals abandoned Gottingen, after demolishing the fortifications, which they had erected at an immense expence, and retired to Melfungen, in order to preserve the communication with Francfort; but on the approach of the Prince they thought proper to pass the Fulda rather than hazard another battle, and the post of Melfungen was occupied by the Allies.

In the month of July, Mons. de Stainville, at the head of several regiments of dragoons, fell into an ambuscade at Merschen, and his whole corps was totally routed and dispersed. But the joy occasioned by those various successes was somewhat damped by an unfortunate enterprize of the Hereditary Prince, who, prompted by youthful impetuosity, attacking with very inferior force the Prince of Condé, on his march from the Lower Rhine to join Soubize, was not only defeated, but so dangerously wounded that he was rendered incapable of taking any active part in the operations of the remaining part of the campaign. Prince Ferdinand now determined to lay siege to Cassel, and the French Generals perceiving his intentions, made repeated efforts to throw supplies into the place; but were effectually prevented by the vigilance and activity of that able commander. The trenches were opened on the 16th October, and the operations carried on with such vigor, that notwithstanding the place was defended with great bravery, by the Baron de Diesbach, the governor, he found himself obliged to sign a capitulation on the 1st November, when the garrison marched out with all the honors of war.
ed

His Serene Highness intended to have closed the campaign with the siege of Zeigenhayn, which was the only fortress in Hesse now possessed by the French; but his preparations were interrupted by the cessation of arms which took place at this period, immediately on signing the preliminaries of peace between Great Britain and France. Thus ended the military career of that celebrated commander, after he had, in the course of six successive and prosperous campaigns, exhibited to the world the most convincing proofs of his consummate knowledge of the art of war.

On the 2d of January 1762, died Elizabeth Empress of Russia, by which fortunate event the most formidable and inveterate of all the enemies of the Prussian Monarch were converted into friends and allies; for her successor Peter III.—a prince of the House of Holstein, and a descendant of the elder daughter of Peter the Great—entertained so enthusiastic an attachment to that hero, that he not only concluded a treaty of peace, but sent express orders to the Russian commanders to co-operate rate with him; and a body of troops under Count Czernicheff actually joined the Prussian army. The Swedes also, by his example, were induced to accede to terms of accommodation.

In the beginning of May, Prince Henry unexpectedly passing the Muldaw, surprized the left wing of the Austrian camp; on which occasion General Zetzwitz was taken prisoner, with fifteen hundred men, after which the Prince made himself master of Freyburg; and in the beginning of June repulsed the Austrians, who made a sudden attack upon his camp, with great loss. In Silesia, the King, now strengthened by the accession of the Russians, as well as by the troops he had withdrawn from Pomerania, advanced towards Count Daun, who retired at his approach, and left a free passage for the Prussians, who invested Schweidnitz on the 8th of August, notwithstanding the secession of the Russians, who in consequence of a surprizing revolution that had taken place at the Court of St. Petersburg, were no longer at liberty to co-operate with him. This was no other than the deposition of the reigning Emperor, by his own consort Catherine of Anhalt, a woman of great talents, courage, and ambition, whose just resentment he had fatally provoked. This enterprize was conducted with wonderful secrecy, resolution, and dispatch. The Emperor was indulging himself in the most perfect ease and security, security, at his country palace of Oranjebaum, when the Empress suddenly appearing before it, at the head of ten thousand men, summoned him to surrender. With this demand he instantly complied with the most abject pusillanimity, though he was accompanied with his Holstein Guards, and in a condition to have made a vigorous defence. He was immediately sent, under a strong escort, to the castle of Petershoff, where, in a few days, he was carried off by a sudden illness. This revolution was not productive of the least discontent or disorder, in any part of that vast empire, the follies and vices of the late Czar having rendered him the object of the public contempt and detestation. The Empress Catherine, though she would not grant any assistance to the Prussian Monarch, was by no means inclined to recommence the war, and the Russian armies immediately began their march to their own country.

The siege of Schweidnitz was now carried on with great vigor; and a mine being sprung by the besiegers, on the 8th of October, in consequence of which great part of the wall was thrown into the fossé, and preparations made for a general assault, Count de Guasco, the Governor, thought proper to beat the chamade, and he, with the whole garrison, were made prisoners of war. The Imperial and Austrian armies in Saxony had, during the progress of the siege, defeated a body of troops under General Belling, and retaken Freyburg; but Prince Henry receiving a strong reinforcement from Silesia, attacked the combined forces under the command of the Prince of Stolberg, at break of day, on the 29th Oct. (1762): The action lasted till two o'clock in the afternoon, when the enemy being entirely routed, abandoned the field of battle, and the town of Freyburg, with the loss of five thousand men.

A a 4

troops

A suspension of arms between the Courts of Vienna and Berlin, taking place soon afterwards, this was the last service performed in the field by Prince Henry, in the course of this war, in which he had repeatedly displayed all the qualities of an accomplished general. And if the Monarch was celebrated for his spirit of enterprize, for a genius fertile in resources, for his wonderful activity, and for a valor almost approaching to desperation, the Prince was not less remarkable for his cool intrepidity, his sagacity, his firmness, and vigilance. The suspension of arms was quickly followed by the treaty of Hubertsburg, the most material article of which imported, that all conquests on each side should be evacuated, and peace re-established on the footing of former treaties. Such was the issue of a war in which two hundred and fifty thousand lives were sacrificed, an immensity of treasure expended, and the fairest provinces of the Empire reduced to a state of ruin and desolation.

We

We are now at liberty to advert to the civil and political transactions by which the administration of Mr. Pitt was distinguished. Amongst the first and most remarkable of which we may reckon the establishment of a national militia: A measure highly popular and patriotic; though the plan itself, which was calculated for the emergency of the occasion, and which has never suffered any essential alteration, must be acknowledged extremely crude, imperfect, and defective. Nor is it to be imagined that a comprehensive and effectual system of national defence, is to be supported at so small an expence as the insignificant sum allotted for this most important purpose, and which is scarcely equal to the usual amount of a retaining fee to a German Elector. The number of men was originally fixed by the House of Commons at sixty-four thousand, but by the House of Lords reduced to thirty-two thousand. The grand and radical defect of this plan is, that a service which ought to be sought as a privilege, is imposed as an obligation. This national army is absurdly and arbitrarily selected from the general mass of the community, by lot, or, in other words, by a blind and indiscriminate compulsion; so that it necessarily exhibits a bizarre and fortuitous combination of alacrity and fullness, of imbecility and vigor. Were regular and reasonable pay allowed to each man, in the intervals of actual service, those who are best qualified to

to serve would voluntarily and cheerfully enrol themselves, and the kingdom would be defended not by the refuse, but by the choice and flower of the nation. And with proper attention to discipline, these troops might soon be raised nearly or entirely to a level with the regulars of the service. In fact, the standing army of Prussia is at this day no other than a well-regulated national militia, adapted to the circumstances of that country. And were a national militia corresponding to the circumstances of this kingdom once established, the far greater part of the present formidable and unconstitutional standing army might be safely disbanded. And though it is remote from the province of history to descend to specific or minute calculation, it might be easily demonstrated, that the expence of such an establishment would not equal the amount of the sums annually voted by Parliament, for maintaining possession of the barren rock of Gibraltar, the unjust retention of which, notwithstanding the plain dictates of common sense, and the dear-bought experience of Calais, Dunkirk, Port Mahon, and Tangier, we still continue with credulous enthusiasm to believe essential to the national prosperity and welfare.

In the summer of 1757, the Empress-Queen recalled her Minister, Count Coloredo, from London; and at the same time notified to Mr. Keith, the English Minister at Vienna, her determination

tion to break off all correspondence with the King of England, declaring that she could not see with indifference his Britannic Majesty enter into an alliance with her enemy the King of Prussia, instead of assisting her with the succors due by the most solemn treaties.

The French interest in Holland prevailing at this time in an alarming degree, Sir Joseph Yorke, the English Ambassador at the Hague, was ordered to represent to the States-General the astonishment of the King of England, at the permission given by their High Mightinesses, for the free passage of a large train of warlike implements and stores through Namur and Maestricht, for the use of the French army; and still more at their tame acquiescence in the surrender of Ostend and Nieuport, by the Empress-Queen, to the French, in direct contravention of the barrier treaty, and of the treaty of Utrecht, which expressly declare, that no fortresses, town, or territory, of the Austrian Low Countries, shall be ceded or transferred to the Crown of France, upon any pretext whatever. The States, however, were not inclined to deviate from their professed system of neutrality; and they alleged, without reserve or hesitation, their inability to prevent these infractions of former treaties, as sufficiently excusing, or rather justifying their connivance at them.

At

At the meeting of Parliament, December 1757, the King, in his speech from the throne, mentioned the late happy successes in Germany, and recommended "that his good brother and ally, the King of Prussia, might be assisted in such a manner as his magnanimity and zeal for the common cause appeared to deserve; expressing his firm reliance on the zeal of his faithful Commons for the support of the Protestant religion, and of the liberties of Europe." The answer of the Commons was in the highest degree dutiful and loyal; and the supplies, amounting to considerably more than ten millions, voted almost without the formality of a debate—Sir Francis Dashwood only venturing to express his total dissent from, and disapprobation of, the measures now adopted*. How the Protestant religion was concerned in the disputes of the present belligerent powers, it seemed, in particular,

* In a debate of the House of Commons several years subsequent to this period, Mr. Pitt declared, that every Session during his administration, he called out, "Has any body any objection to the German war? Nobody would object to it, one Gentleman only excepted, since removed to the Upper House by succession to an antient Barony (Sir Francis Dashwood, now Lord Le Despencer); he told me he did not like a German war; I honored the man for it, and was sorry when he was turned out of his post." On another occasion, he affirmed, "that it was impossible, after the treaties made with the King of Prussia, to leave that Monarch to the mercy of his enemies; and that he entered into office with the German war tied like a mill-stone about his neck."

far

far beyond the reach of men of common understandings to comprehend. It was notorious that Saxony, long accounted the first Protestant power in Germany, was ruined and desolated by the Protestant Hero; that the Swedes, who have ever distinguished themselves by their zeal in defence of the Protestant faith, were themselves parties in this pretended confederacy against Protestantism; that Denmark and Holland discovered no particular symptoms of alarm on this occasion, though as little inclined to advance the interests, or extend the power, of Popery, as Great Britain itself.

The resentment of Holland was, at this period, inflamed in a very high degree against England, in consequence of the numerous seizures made by the English of Dutch vessels, employed in carrying naval stores and transporting merchandize, the produce of the French islands, to Europe. A memorial, to which was affixed a prodigious number of commercial signatures of the first consequence, was presented to the States General, in which their High Mightinesses are strongly urged to protect the commerce and navigation of the republic by an armed force. The King of England, on the other hand, declared, by his Ambassador, that he would not suffer an illicit and injurious trade to be carried on under the specious pretext of neutrality. And the wisdom and moderation of the Princess's Governante scarcely sufficed to prevent an open rupture.

The

The death of that Princess, which took place at the beginning of the ensuing year, was the subject of real and equal regret to both nations.

In the month of August 1758, a decree of the Aulic Council was published, enjoining all Directories of Circles, Imperial cities, &c. to transmit to Vienna an exact account of those who had disobeyed the avocatoria of the Empire, and adhered to the REBELLION raised by the Elector of Brandenburg, that their revenues might be sequestered, and themselves punished in their honors, persons, and effects. The King of England, knowing himself to be chiefly aimed at in this decree, presented, by his Minister Baron Gemmingen, a spirited memorial to the Diet of the Empire, enumerating the important services which he had rendered to the House of Austria, for which he had even exposed his life in the field of battle; in return for which the Empress-Queen had formed an alliance with France for the invasion of his Electorate: And the Duke of Cumberland, who had been wounded at Dettingen in the cause of her Imperial Majesty, was compelled to fight at Hastenbeck against the troops of that Princess, in defence of his father's dominions. That the King of England was threatened with the ban of the Empire for not complying with the resolutions of the Diet for assembling an army, although the conduct of the Imperial Court rendered it indispensable to his safety to retain his troops for the protection of his subjects. He acknowledged that, in quality of King of England, and for just reasons, he had sent over English troops to Germany, and had taken possession of Embden; for which he was accountable to no power upon earth. And he expressed his hope that the Diet would, upon deliberate advice, not only exhort the Emperor to recal or annul his recent mandates, but institute such proceedings against the Empress-Queen, in the quality of Arch-duchess of Austria, as she wished to enforce against the King of England, as Elector of Hanover." The original aggression of the laws of the Empire rested, after all, solely and plainly with the King of Prussia, who was as clearly supported and defended in his contumacy by the King of England; and if these two Monarchs, as Members of the Germanic Body, were at liberty to disobey and condemn the decrees of the Diet, the Germanic Constitution was no more. No common centre of union remained by which that vast body could exercise its sovereign authority, or even demonstrate its political existence. The Diet, however, wisely chose to refrain, in present circumstances, from the assumption of a prerogative which they were in no condition to enforce. And the numberless memorials, and counter-memorials, published in the course of this war, served to little other purpose than to shew the extraordinary degree of animosity and rancor by which

I

troops

which the belligerent powers were universally actuated.

In the course of this year died the celebrated Prosper Lambertini, who, on his elevation to the Papal chair, A. D. 1740, assumed the name of Benedict XIV. The good sense, candor, and moderation, of this amiable Pontiff, made him scarcely less the subject of esteem and veneration in the Protestant than the Catholic states of Europe. But, unfortunately, his political influence was too weak to enable him to compose those differences by which Christendom had been so long disgraced and desolated. He was succeeded in the Papacy by Cardinal Rezzonico, Bishop of Padua, who took the name of Clement XIII. And the new Pope found an early opportunity of displaying his weakness and bigotry, by sending a consecrated banner, accompanied with his Apostolic benediction, to the Austrian General Count Daun. A recent attempt, scarcely worthy of historic notice, as neither arising from any political cause, nor producing any political effect, had been made on the life of the King of France, by an insane fanatic of the name of Damien, who, in consequence of this crime, expired in torments, the national sufferance, and, much more, the national approval of which, in the view of reason and humanity, degraded the character of the most polished and civilized country on the globe to a temporary level with that of the Onondagas dagas and Cherokees. In the autumn of the present year, a royal assassination in all its circumstances much more extraordinary and interesting, the full extent and mysterious nature of which have never been perfectly developed, was attempted on the person of his Most Faithful Majesty, who passing, September 3, in his carriage over a solitary spot near the palace of Belem, was fired at and dangerously wounded by two villains on horseback, one of whom made his escape; the other being put to the question, impeached the Duc d'Aveiro, President of the palace, the Marquis and Marchioness of Tavora, the Count d'Atouguia, and several other persons of the highest rank, as parties in this conspiracy, who were accordingly tried, convicted, and suffered sentence of death on the scaffold. It appearing, from undoubted evidence, that the Jesuits, who had been for some time past in disgrace at Court, were the principal instigators to this wicked attempt, the effects and property of the whole order were sequestered, and a decree of banishment finally issued against them.

The Parliament of England being convened in November (1758), the Lord Keeper Henley made a speech to both Houses, by command of his Majesty, in which the successes of the year were ostentatiously enumerated; and the Commons were anew exhorted vigorously to support the King of Prussia, and the rest of his Majesty's Allies. The expense incurred by England at this time for the payment of subsidies, and the maintenance of armies in Germany alone, exceeded three millions sterling; which immense sum, as well as all the other supplies demanded by the Minister, were now voted almost as a matter of course. Towards the termination of the Session, May 1759, the King informed the two Houses, by messages delivered by Lord Holderness and Mr. Pitt, the two Secretaries of State, that he had received authentic advice of preparations making by the French Court with a design to invade Great Britain: And both Houses, in return, assured his Majesty of their determination to support, with their lives and fortunes, his person and government against all attempts whatever. Directions also were issued to the Lords Lieutenants of the respective counties of the kingdom, to use their utmost diligence and attention in executing the several acts of Parliament made for the better ordering the militia. This alarm, however, after the defeat of the French fleet by Admiral Hawke, entirely subsided.

In the month of August, an event of great political importance took place in the death of Ferdinand, King of Spain, who, in consequence of the loss of the Queen his consort, had, for many months, renounced all company, neglected all business, and indulged in the utmost excesses of sorrow, under the weight of which he languished, without without relief or intermission, to the final termination of his life. He was succeeded by his brother Don Carlos, King of the Sicilies—a Prince by no means so favorably disposed as his predecessor to the English nation; and who still harbored a deep resentment of the insult offered to his Crown and dignity in the former war, by the threatened bombardment of his capital, and the humiliating treaty of neutrality to which he was compelled to accede. This Monarch, previous to his departure from Naples, by a solemn edict, resigned the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily to his younger son, Don Ferdinand, in contravention and contempt of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, which expressly declares, that, if the Infant Don Carlos shall succeed to the throne of Spain, the Duchies of Parma, Placentia, and Guastalla, shall revert to the House of Austria, and the Infant Don Philip shall succeed to the throne of the Sicilies. But to this article Don Carlos had never acceded; and the Court of Vienna was not at this time in a situation to enforce the observance of it.

In November 1759, the Parliament was again opened by commission, and the Lord Keeper again enlarged on the signal successes of his Majesty's arms by sea and land; particularly distinguishing the reduction of Quebec and the victory of Minden—declaring, however, by the command of his Sovereign, “that, as his Majesty entered not into this war from views of ambition, he did not wish to continue it from motives of resentment; that the desire of his Majesty's heart was to see a stop put to the effusion of Christian blood, whenever just and honorable terms of peace could be obtained." It was consolatory to the humane and dispassionate part of the nation, after the sacrifice of such countless hetacombs of human victims, and the expenditure of so many millions of treasure, at length to hear the sound of peace. But the majority, intoxicated with ideas of conquest, were far from wishing the speedy termination of the war; and, from the enormous supplies granted by Parliament, amounting this year to no less than fifteen millions, it seemed as if the nation, eager for its own impoverishment and ruin, was willing to purchase glory with bread.

In the course of this Session, an effort was made to render efficient the famous Parliamentary qualification act of Queen Anne, by the introduction of a bill, which, with some modifications, eventually passed into a law. By virtue of the new act, it became necessary for every person elected a Member of the House of Commons, to deliver in a paper or schedule to the Speaker of the House, specifying the lands, tenements, and hereditaments, whereby he makes out his qualification. But this regulation served only to increase in some degree the trouble, and not at all to diminish the frequency of evasion.

The

The truth is, that the act, which was originally designed to promote the interests of a faction, is so contrary to the sense and to the interest of the nation, that it neither can nor ought to be enforced. Perfect freedom of choice on the part of the people is the only rational security for the integrity of the representative body; and to impose any arbitrary restrictions of this nature, by which they might be eventually deprived of the services of some of the most honest and able members of the community, is an unconstitutional violation of their just and imprescriptible rights*.

The

* This act of Queen Anne, originally framed to strengthen the interest of the Tory faction, can be justified on no principle of reason or equity; for there is no ground to suppose that integrity bears any determinate ratio to property. Men in the higher walks of life are far from being, on that account, the most independent. Having a specific rank to support, and dreading the least degradation from it, they have always much for themselves and families to ask—admitting that they cherish no ambitious ideas of advancement—at least to maintain their accustomed level in society. Whereas, persons in less elevated stations, of inferior fortune, and different habits, more easily learn to moderate their desires, and not unfrequently entertain a real indifference for those honors and riches which it is the lot of so few to possess—

“And which to leave’s a thousand-fold more bitter
Than sweet at first t’acquire.”

It is true, that absolute indigence is apparently incompatible with independence: But there is little danger that persons of this description should be returned Members to Parliament, except the virtue of the individual should in

The subject which at this time chiefly engrossed the public attention, was the court-martial held upon Lord George Sackville, Commander of the British forces in Germany, in consequence of the charge brought against him of disobeying the repeated orders of Prince Ferdinand, to advance with the cavalry, in order to sustain the infantry, and to attack the enemy, already broken, at the memorable battle of Minden. From this charge his Lordship was not able to clear himself to the satisfaction of the public. For, though it appeared that there were in the orders transmitted by the different Aids-du-Camp some degree of variation, perhaps of inconsistency, it was universally acknowledged that the necessity of bringing the cavalry into immediate action was strongly and repeatedly urged to his Lordship. Colonel Fitzroy *, in particular, some rare instance be deemed proof against all temptation, as in the case of the famous Andrew Marvel, who is said, after refusing a treasury warrant for a thousand pounds, to have been under the necessity of applying to a friend for the loan of a guinea.

“ Gemmas, marmor, ebur, Tyrthæna figilla, tabellas,
Argentum, vestes Gaetulo murice tinctas
Sunt qui non habeant ; est qui non curat habere.”

HOR.

“ Gold, silver, ivory, vases, sculptur'd high,
Paint, marble, gems, and robes of Tyrian dye,
There are who have not—and thank Heaven there are,
Who, if they have not, think not worth their care.”

POPE.

* New Lord Southampton.

after

after stating the circumstances which occasioned the order, added, with great gallantry, "that it was a glorious opportunity for the English to distinguish themselves, and that his Lordship, by leading them on, would gain immortal honor." Admitting, then, the commands of his Serene Highness to be in any respect doubtful, his Lordship might surely have been guided in the interpretation of them by his own discretion; and nothing could be more absurd or unpardonable than to waste those irreparable moments in coldly seeking an explanation of orders, which ought to have been occupied in the vigorous execution of them. In conclusion, the court-martial adjudged that Lord George Sackville was guilty of disobeying the orders of Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, his Commander—declaring him, for this offence, incapable of serving his Majesty in any military capacity whatsoever. This sentence was confirmed by the King, who, as a farther mark of his resentment, called in council for the council-book, and ordered the name of Lord George Sackville to be struck out of the list of Privy Counsellors. Such was the last public act of this Monarch's reign and life: For, on Saturday the 25th of October 1760, being at the palace of Kensington, where he commonly resided, he was suddenly seized with an apoplectic fit, soon after his rising in usual health in the morning. Recovering his senses after a short interval, he desired, with a faint voice, that his daughter the Princess Amelia might be sent for; but, before her arrival, he expired, in the seventy-seventh year of his age, and the thirty-fourth of his reign. During this long period, he had experienced many vicissitudes of fortune; but he lived to see himself the most successful of all the English Monarchs. And, after the dark and lowering aspect which his political horizon occasionally exhibited, his sun set at last in a golden cloud.

The character of this Monarch it is not easy either to mistake or to misrepresent. Endowed by nature with an understanding by no means comprehensive, he had taken little pains to improve and expand his original powers by intellectual cultivation. Equally a stranger to learning and the arts, he saw the rapid increase of both under his reign, without contributing in the remotest degree to accelerate that progression by any mode of encouragement, or even bestowing, probably, a single thought on the means of their advancement. Inheriting all the political prejudices of his father—prejudices originating in a partiality natural and pardonable—he was never able to extend his views beyond the adjustment of the Germanic balance of power; and resting with unsuspicious satisfaction in that system, into which he had been early initiated, he never rose even to the conception of that simple, dignified, and impartial conduct, which it is equally the honor and interest of Great Britain to maintain in in all the complicated contests of the Continental States. It is curious to remark, that the grand objects of the two Continental wars of this reign were diametrically opposite: In the first, England fought the aggrandizement—in the second, the abasement of the House of Austria. And in what mode the consequent advancement of Prussia, at an expence to England so enormous, to the rank of a primary power in Europe, has contributed to the establishment or preservation of that political balance, upon the accurate poize of which many have affirmed, and perhaps some have believed, that the salvation of England depends, yet remains to be explained. In the internal government of his kingdoms, this Monarch appears, however, to much greater advantage than in the contemplation of his system of foreign politics. Though many improper concessions were made by the Parliament to the Crown during the course of this reign, it must be acknowledged, that no violation of the established laws or liberties of the kingdom can be imputed to the Monarch. The general principles of his administration, both civil and religious, were liberal and just. Those penal statutes which form the disgrace of our judicial code, were, in his reign, meliorated, and virtually suspended, by the superior mildness and equity of the Executive Power. And it was a well-known and memorable declaration of this beneficent Monarch, “that, during his reign, there there should be no persecution for conscience sake." Though subject to occasional sallies of passion, his disposition was naturally generous and easily placable. On various occasions, he had given signal demonstrations of personal bravery; nor did the general tenor of his conduct exhibit proofs less striking of his rectitude and integrity: And, if he cannot be ranked amongst the greatest, he is at least entitled to be classed with the most respectable Princes of the age in which he lived, and his memory is deservedly held in national esteem and veneration.

The general state of literature and the arts during this reign, it may be thought improper to pass over without a specific, however transient, mention. In the early part of it, a shadow of royal protection and encouragement displayed itself in the countenance given by Queen Caroline—a Princess of an excellent understanding and much liberality of sentiment—to several learned men, with whom she loved freely to converse; particularly with Dr. Samuel Clarke, so famous for his theological and metaphysical writings; and whose speculative opinions, in their full extent, the Queen was believed to have deeply imbibed. Hoadley, the friend of this illustrious philosopher, was advanced, through a long series of promotions, to the Bishopric of Winchester; and Dr. Clarke himself was, it is said, destined, had not his death prematurely and unex.

unexpectedly intervened, to the Archbishopric of Canterbury. These great and celebrated ecclesiastics, the brightest ornaments and luminaries of the English Church, were anxiously solicitous to advance its true interest, as well as honor, by effecting a farther reform, both of its discipline and doctrine, on the genuine principles of Protestantism. But the political caution, and not the religious bigotry, of the governing powers, unhappily precluded the attempt.

The Prince of Wales also, at a subsequent period, shewed a disposition, though restrained in the ability, to become a munificent patron of literature: And Mallet, Thomson, and Young, are said to have been particularly distinguished by his bounty. The Seasons, and the Night Thoughts, are poems of high and deserved celebrity. But the most truly poetical genius of this reign was unquestionably Gray, had his powers been fully expanded by the sunshine of popular and courtly encouragement. The Bard and Church-yard Elegy are master-pieces of sublime enthusiasm, and plaintive elegance. In the drama no tragedies appeared which could stand even a momentary competition with the admired and pathetic productions of Otway, or even the elegant though less impassioned performances of Rowe. In comedy, Congreve, Vanbrugh, and Farquhar yet remained unrivalled. And of the far greater part of the numerous dramatic matic pieces of this period, it may be affirmed in the words of Dryden, "that the tragic muse gave smiles, the comic sleep."

In one species of literary composition, however, and that of the highest importance, the reign of George II. may boast a decided and indisputable superiority; and in the province of history, the names of Hume and Robertson will ever claim the highest rank of eminence. Taking it for all in all, Hume's History of England may perhaps be justly regarded as the greatest effort of historic genius which the world ever saw. His philosophic impartiality, approaching indeed occasionally the confines of indifference, his profound sagacity, his diligence of research, his felicity of selection and arrangement, the dignified elegance of his style, which yet rarely aspires to elevation or energy—all combine to stamp upon this work the characteristics of high and indisputable excellence. With such happiness, and with touches so masterly, are the principal personages of his history delineated, that a more clear and perfect idea is frequently conveyed by Mr. Hume, in a few lines, than we are able to derive from the elaborate amplifications of Lord Clarendon, whose historical portraits, though drawn certainly with great accuracy and closeness of observation, are finished rather in the style of the Flemish than the Roman school. With respect to the Historian of Charles V. it is sufficient to say, say, that he has been often highly, but never too highly praised. From a rude and indigested chaos of matter he has selected those facts which are truly and permanently interesting, and which alone it imports posterity to know, connecting them with exquisite skill, and adorning his narration with all the graces of a simple, pure, and luminous diction, wholly free from those meretricious ornaments, that tumid pomp, and gaudy display of eloquence, by which later writers have been unfortunately ambitious to acquire reputation.

In metaphysics, Hartley established a system admirable for its simplicity, for the extent and importance of its practical application, and its perfect correspondence with all the actual phenomena of human nature, upon the firm and immovable foundation of Locke. This system, now rising into general regard and estimation, has been violently attacked by some ingenious writers, whose darts have "faintly tinkled on the brazen shield" of this great philosopher, the theory of whom has been most ably vindicated by the pen of the celebrated Priestley, whose name, at once the glory and the reproach of the English nation, is revered in every part of the globe where the light of science has penetrated; and whose peculiar praise and honor it is, long to have been the object of the malignant animosity, and, as far as the spirit of the times times would permit, of the persecution of the "holy Vandals" of the age.

In philology, morals, and criticism, Bentley, Warburton, and more recently Johnson, shone with distinguished lustre.

In theology, amidst an host of great and respectable names, it cannot be deemed invidious to bestow the highest applause on that of Lardner, who, unassisted by the advantages, and unadorned by the honors of our national seminaries of education, composed a stupendous work on the credibility of Christianity, no less to be admired for its candor, impartiality, and sagacious spirit of research, than its amazing extent and depth of erudition; and it is not without reason that he has been styled, by a justly celebrated writer, who cannot be suspected of partiality either to the cause or the advocate, "the prince of modern divines." Foster, Leland, Chandler, Abernethy, Duchal, and many other eminent names, not of the Established Church, maintained also, with distinguished honor to themselves, by their various learned theological and philosophical writings, at once the reputation of their separate communion, and the authority of that common faith which all denominations of Christians are equally concerned to support. In the pale of the Establishment, the venerable Lowth distinguished himself above all his his cotemporaries, by adorning the profoundest disquisitions in sacred literature, with all the charms of classic elegance. And the excellent Jortin, in the justness and comprehension of his views, the clearness and accuracy of his reasonings, attained to high, perhaps unrivalled pre-eminence. His Remarks on Ecclesiastical History abound with the most candid and liberal sentiments; and his Life of Erasmus discovers a mind perfectly congenial with that of the illustrious scholar whose portrait he has delineated—the same ingenuous simplicity, the same urbanity, wit, and polished keenness of satire—in rectitude equal, in fortitude superior. Had Erasmus flourished in our days, Jortin would surely have been his favourite and chosen friend; for we know that his admired and beloved Colet was but the Jortin of a former age. For the famous and incomparable preface prefixed to his Remarks, he is said to have been menaced by the High Church bigots of his time with a legal prosecution; but this threat was rendered ineffectual by the moderation of the governors of the Church at that period, and particularly of Herring, Archbishop of Canterbury—a prelate eminent for discernment, candor, and benignity, and who had declared to Dr. Jortin that he would be to him what Warham had been to Erasmus. It was, however, late in life before the extraordinary merits of Jortin attracted tracted that attention to which they were so well intitled : And he himself truly and feelingly speaks of the patronage said to be afforded to literature by men of rank and fortune, as “ a Milesian fable and a fairy tale.”

Before the conclusion of this reign, Reynolds in painting, in sculpture Wilton, began to rise into fame : And the exquisite musical compositions of Handel were vigorously emulated by Arne and Boyce. But to whatever degree of perfection science, literature, and the arts, arose, during even its last splendid and memorable period, the sole and exclusive honor of patronage appertains—not to the Court—not to any Mæcenas or Dorset of the age—not to the encouragement derived from academical honors or premiums—but to the taste, discernment, and generosity of the NATION.

THUS have these Memoirs of Great Britain been at length brought to a determinate period—perhaps, at some future time—if in future time the truth may be safely spoken—to be resumed. If any apology be necessary for the freedom with which they are written, no words more proper can be adopted than those already excellently urged by M. Voltaire.

taire. "We have been amused, says this philosopher, long enough with those splendid trifles which describe the pomp of a coronation, the ceremony of receiving a hat, or the public entrée of an ambassador. What we want is an history of mankind itself, and not of kings or courts, which gratify only an idle curiosity, and leave us destitute of instruction or improvement."

HISTORY, according to a very just and celebrated definition of it, is PHILOSOPHY teaching by EXAMPLE. And the great purpose to be answered, by a research into the records of past ages, is to learn how to avoid those errors which have been injurious to human happiness, and by what means the general welfare may be most certainly and efficaciously promoted. If History be not written, and if it be not read likewise in this spirit, and with this view, the romantic tales of an Amadis or an Orlando, may be studied with as much advantage as the Memoirs of Great Britain or of France. From increase of knowlege we have a right to expect increase of happiness; and to whatever temporary obstructions the progress of mankind to that perfection of which their nature and condition are susceptible, may be liable, the grand association of knowlege, virtue, and happiness remains, in the moral order of the universe, assuredly fixed and indissoluble. And, to conclude, in the words of an admirable foreign writer: "In vain shall sophisms be scattered, times confounded, or particular facts generalized, in order to shew that the progress of vices follows that of the arts. Whenever we view, with an impartial and attentive eye, the chain of events, and take a comprehensive survey of the whole, we shall invariably behold ignorance the concomitant of crimes, and virtues multiplied in proportion as the human mind is illuminated *."

* "En vain étalera-t-on des sophismes, confondra-t-on les tems, généralisera-t-on les faits particuliers, pour montrer que le progrès des vices suivent les progrès des arts; toutes les fois qu'on portera un œil attentif et juste sur la chaîne des événemens, et qu'on en embrassera l'ensemble, on verra toujours l'ignorance marcher avec les crimes, et les vertus se multiplier avec les lumières."

Tableau de l'Histoire Moderne, par M. de Mehegan.

INDEX.

I. N. D. E. X.

ABERCROMBIE, General, appointed to the chief command in America, vol. ii. 267. His unsuccessful attempt on Ticonderago, ii. 268. Superfeded by General Amherst, 271.

Abo, peace of, between Russia and Sweden, ii. 125.

Achmet III. Emperor of the Turks, his extraordinary deposition, i. 280—284.

Addison, Mr. advanced to the post of Secretary of State, i. 172.; but resigns, ibid. His literary character, 265.

Adolphus-Frederic, King of Sweden, his accession to the throne, ii. 190. His voluntary oath, ibid.

Aix-la-Chapelle, Convention of, i. 262. General peace of, ii. 168.

Alberoni, Cardinal, his character and romantic projects, i. 143—158.

Albemarle, Earl of, his spirited memorial to the French Court, ii. 216.

Amherst, General, assumes the command in America, ii. 267. Captures the city of Louisburg, 268. Reduces the forts of Ticonderago and Crown-Point, 273. Takes the city of Montreal, and completes the conquest of Canada, 281.

Anne, Queen of Great Britain, succeeds to the throne on the death of King William, i. 8. Declares war against France, 10. Her prejudices, political and religious, 54. Dismisses the Whig Ministry, 68. Orders the Attorney-General to commence a prosecution against the Duke of Marlborough, 71. Her death and character, 85.

Anne Iwanowna, Empress of Russia, her accession, i. 280. Her conquests over the Ottomans, 371. Her death, ii. 18.

I N D E X.

Anson, Commodore, detached with a squadron into the South Sea, ii. 17. Returns to England after a circumnavigation of the globe, 18. Engages and defeats a French squadron, 165. Ennobled, ibid. Placed at the head of the Admiralty, 261.

Argyle, Duke of, defeats the rebels at Sheriff-Moor, i. 108. His character drawn, 270. Opposes the bill for inflicting penalties on the city of Edinburgh, 367. Accepts the Master-Generalship of the Ordnance, which he quickly resigns, ii. 49.

Asbby and White, case of, i. 14.

Atterbury, Bishop of Rochester, refuses to sign the protestation against the Pretender, i. 164. Opposes the petition of the Quakers, 210. Engages in a conspiracy against the Government, and banished, 214. Remarkable declaration of Lord Harcourt respecting him, 218. His character and death, 219.

Augustus I. King of Poland, his death, and its political consequences, ii. 332.

Augustus II. King of Poland, joins the confederacy against the Queen of Hungary, ii. 21. Concludes a treaty of peace, 26. Joins the Queen of Hungary against Prussia, 76. His troops defeated at Kesseldorff, and the city of Dresden compelled to surrender, 84. Concludes a treaty of peace with Prussia, ibid. Engages in a subsidy treaty with England, 192; whom he abandons, 228. Enters into secret intrigues to the prejudice of the King of Prussia, 318. His dominions invaded by the King of Prussia, who takes possession of Dresden, 320. His army compelled to capitulate, 321.

B

Balchen, Admiral Sir John, lost, with his whole crew, in the Victory, ii. 140.

Bedford, Duke of, declares his disapprobation of the Hanoverian system, ii. 60. His speech against the bill for extending the forfeitures of treason, 119. Appointed First Lord of the Admiralty, 141. His remarkable motion in the House of Peers, 176.

Belhaven, Earl of, his eloquent speech against the Treaty of Union, i. 35.

Benedict, Pope, XIII. his accession to the papacy, i. 206. His death, 280.

Benedict, Pope, XIV. his death and character, ii. 368.

Bernard, Sir John, his opposition to the foreign loan bill, i. 286. His

I N D E X.

- His speech against the requisition of an unlimited vote of credit, 353. His plan for reducing the public debt, 379.
- Berwick*, Duke of, gains the battle of Almanza, i. 46. Captures Fontarabia and St. Sebastian, 160. Reduces Fort Kehl and Traerbach, 334. Killed by a cannon-ball at the siege of Philippsburg, ibid.
- Braddock*, General, his disastrous expedition to the Ohio, ii. 221.
- Bligh*, General, his unfortunate retreat to St. Cas, ii. 284.
- Bolingbroke*, Viscount, appointed Secretary of State, i. 69. Repairs to Paris to negotiate the peace, 76. His character, 78. Brings in a bill against the Pretender, 83. Removed from his office, 97. ; and impeached of high treason, 100. Withdraws to the continent, ibid. Engages in the service of the Pretender, 103. Bill of attainder passed against him, 106. His character of the Pretender, 111. Act of attainder reversed, 217. Joins the Opposition, infligated by chagrin and ambition, 218. Acquires the favour and confidence of the Prince of Wales, ii. 171. His character in the concluding years of his life, 172.
- Boscawen*, Admiral, captures the Alcide and the Lys, ii. 220. Defeats the French fleet off Cape Lagos, 285.
- Bourbon*, Duke of, succeeds the Duke of Orleans as Regent of France, i. 231.
- Breslau*, treaty of, ii. 25.
- British Fishery*, act passed for its encouragement, ii. 185.
- Bute*, Earl of, introduced into the household of the Prince of Wales, ii. 175. His baleful influence, 176.
- Byng*, Sir George, defeats a French armament from Dunkirk, i. 43. Engages and destroys the Spanish fleet off Messina, 149. Created Viscount Torrington, 150.
- Byng*, Admiral, dispatched to the relief of Minorca, ii. 246. His indecisive engagement with Monf. Galiffioniere, 247. His pusillanimous retreat to Gibraltar, 249. His trial and execution, 253, 254.

C

- Cambray*, Congress of, i. 160.
- Cameron*, Dr. his trial and barbarous execution, ii. 202.
- Cape Breton*, island of, taken by Admiral Warren, ii. 158. Restored by the peace of Aix la Chapelle, ii. 170. Captured by General Amherst, 268.
- Carew*, Mr. his motion for restoring annual parliaments, ii. 142.

I N D E X

- Carteret*, Lord, his character, i. 270. Appointed to the government of Ireland, 278. His wise administration, 279. He resigns his offices, and joins the Opposition, 298. Supports the Pension bill, ibid. Declares against votes of credit, 383. Appointed Principal Secretary of State, ii. 48. Votes against the Pension bill, 50. Insinuates himself into the favour of the King, 57. Appointed Ambassador-Extraordinary to the States-General, 58. His insidious policy, 67, 68. Engrossed by Continental politics, 103. His speech in vindication of the Continental war, 106. Against dismissing the Hanoverian mercenaries, 115. Compelled to resign his office, 141. Becomes Earl of Granville, is re-appointed to the office of Secretary of State, and again resigns, 160. Made President of the Council, ibid.
- Carlos*, Don, succeeds to the Duchies of Parma, &c. i. 300. Conquers Naples and Sicily, 335. Succeeds to the crown of Spain, ii. 371.
- Caroline*, Queen of Great Britain, dies, i. 370. Her liberality of sentiment, ii. 378.
- Catherine I.* Empress of Russia, her accession to the throne, i. 244. Offended at the measures of the English Court, ibid. Accedes to the treaty of Vienna, 245. Death of the Empress, 261.
- Catherine II.* Empress of Russia, her accession and character, ii. 357.
- Charles XII.* King of Sweden, offended at the purchase of Bremen and Verden, i. 132. Projects the invasion of Great Britain, ibid. His death and character, 140.
- Charles VI.* Emperor of Germany, concludes a peace with France, at Al-Rastadt, i. 77. Engages as a party in the quadruple alliance, 145. Refuses to the King of England the investitures of Bremen and Verden, 162. Grants a protectorial commission for Mecklenburg, ibid. His jealousy of the King of England, 229. Establishes an Imperial East India Company at Ostend, 230. Concludes an alliance with Spain, 231. Agrees to preliminaries of accommodation with England, 262. Offended at the treaty of Seville, 280—286. His unsuccessful war with Turkey, 371. His death, ii. 18.
- Charles VII.* Emperor of Germany, Elector of Bavaria, his claim upon the Austrian succession, ii. 21. Invades the Archduchy of Austria, and threatens Vienna, 23. Crowned King of Bohemia at Prague, ibid. Elected Emperor at Francfort, ibid. Reduced to great difficulty and distress, 26. His decree against the Queen of Hungary, 27. In danger of being made a prisoner, 62. Signs a treaty at Francfort, with Prussia, Sweden, and

INDEX.

- and the Elector Palatine, 75. Recovers possession of Munich his capital, and dies, 79.
- Charles-Emmanuel*, King of Sardinia, succeeds to the crown on the resignation of his father, i. 280. Orders the person of the late King to be seized, 325. Declares war against the Emperor, in conjunction with France and Spain, 334. Joins the House of Austria against Spain and France, ii. 28. In danger of losing his dominions, 32. He is remunerated for his services, 36.
- Charles*, Prince of Lorraine, opposes the King of Prussia in Silesia, ii. 25. Advances into Bohemia, and invests the city of Prague, 26. Crosses the Rhine, and invades the kingdom of France, 74. Compels the King of Prussia to evacuate Bohemia, 77. Defeated by Marechal Saxe, at Roucoux, 96. Defeated by the King of Prussia at Prague, 322. Superfeded in the command by Marshal Daun, 323.
- Cherbourg*, city of, taken by Lord Howe, who destroys its basin and harbour, ii. 283.
- Chesterfield*, Earl of, his character, i. 268. His speech against the Bill for licensing the Stage, 374. Inveighs against a continental war, ii. 59. His speech on moving the address, 104. Appointed to the Government of Ireland, 141. Goes as Ambassador-extraordinary to Holland, 153. The wisdom and popularity of his government, 156. Presents a bill for the reform of the Calendar, 188.
- Christiern VI.* King of Denmark, endeavours to revive the Union of Calmar, ii. 136. Refuses the subsidies of Great Britain, ibid. Renews the alliance with Great Britain, 137. His death, ibid.
- Clement XI.* Pope, dies—his character, i. 206.
- Clement XII.* Pope, his accession, i. 280. Fills the Papal chair ten years, ibid.
- Clive*, Colonel, takes the city of Arcot, ii. 303. Captures, in conjunction with Admiral Watson, the city of Calcutta, 308. Defeats Sou Rajah Doula, 309. Takes Chandernagore, ibid. His march to Moorsheadabad, 311. Gains a complete victory at Plassey, 312.
- Cloister-Seven*, Convention of, ii. 267.
- Coote*, Colonel, defeats M. Lally at Wandewash, ii. 315. Takes the city of Pondichery, 317.
- Cope*, Sir John, defeated by the rebels at Preston-Pans, ii. 90.
- Cotton*, Sir John Hynde, his description of a genuine Whig, i. 373.

I N D E X

- Accepts a place at Court, which he soon resigns, ii. 142. His opposition to the subsidizing system, 194.
- Cowper*, Lord, removed from his office of Lord Chancellor, i. 69. Re-instated, 97. Opposes the repeal of the Test laws, 177, and the Bill for banishing the Bishop of Rochester, 216.
- Crawford*, Earl of, his extraordinary presence of mind, ii. 97.
- Cumberland*, Duke of, wounded at Dettingen, ii. 65. Assumes the command of the allied army against Marshal Saxe, 73. Defeated at Fontenoy, 87. Gains a complete victory over the rebels at Culloden, 94. Defeated by Marshal Saxe, at Laffeldt, 99. His military character, 169. Appointed to the command of the army of observation in Germany, 265. Defeated at Hastenbeck by Marshal D'Etrees, 266. His injudicious retreat to Stade, 266. Obligated to capitulate with his whole army, ibid. Resigns his employments, 267.

D

- Daun*, Marshal, defeats the King of Prussia at Kolin, and relieves Prague, ii. 323. Captures Schweidnitz, 325. Defeats the Prussians under the Prince of Bevern, and takes Breslau, ibid. Defeated by the King of Prussia at Lissa, 326. Relieves Olmutz, and pursues the King into Bohemia, 333. Defeats the King at Hochkirchen, 334. Captures General Finck and his whole army, 340. Defeated by the King at Torgau, 350.
- Derwentwater*, Earl of, appears in arms against the Government, i. 108. Surrenders himself prisoner, ibid. Beheaded on Tower-hill, 112.
- Devonshire*, Duke of, appointed First Commissioner of the Treasury, ii. 257.
- Dorset*, Duke of, his declaration to the Parliament of Ireland, ii. 204.
- Dupleix*, M. his abilities and ambition, ii. 301.

E

- Egmont*, Lord, his opposition to German subsidies, ii. 193.
- Elizabeth*, Empress of Russia, her accession, ii. 18. Orders the march of 40,000 men to the Rhine, 102. Carries on a successful war with the Swedes, 134. Her insidious and interested policy, 190. Concludes a subsidy treaty with England, 229. Enters

I N D E X.

Enters into engagements with France, 230. Joins the confederacy against Prussia, 321—324. Her death, 357.

Eugene, Prince, his interview with the Duke of Marlborough, i. 32. Co-operates with the English General in gaining the victories of Schellenburg and Blenheim, 23. Gains a complete victory at Turin, and relieves the city, 29. Lays siege to Toulon, 46. Joins the Duke of Marlborough in Flanders, 47. Commands the army on the Rhine, 52. Arrives in England, 74. Repulsed at Denain, and compelled to raise the siege of Landreci, 75. Triumphs over the Ottomans, 143. Opposes the Duke of Berwick on the Rhine, 334.

F

Fazakerly, Mr. his speech against the extension of forfeitures for high treason, ii. 123.

Ferdinand, Prince, reassembles the allied army at Stade, ii. 329. Recovers Hanover, and compels the French to repass the Rhine, 330. Defeats the French army at Crevelt, 331. Repulsed by Mareschal Broglie at Bergen, 336. Gains a complete victory at Minden, 337. Defeats the French at Warbourg, 344. Defeats the French at Grabenstein, 355. Takes the city of Cassel, 356.

Ferdinand II. King of Spain, his accession, ii. 165. Restores to the English their commercial privileges, 186. Determined to maintain his neutrality, 227. Offers his mediation to the Courts of Versailles and London, 228. His excessive grief at the loss of the Queen, and death, 370, 371.

Finale, Marquise of, belonging to Genoa, fraudulently ceded to the King of Sardinia, ii. 66.

Fleury, Cardinal, gains the reversion of Lorraine for France, i. 337. Offers the mediation of France to accommodate the differences between Spain and England, ii. 14. His death, 72.

Fox, Right Honourable Henry, his character, ii. 180. Appointed Principal Secretary of State, 236. His spirited reply to M. Rouille, 241. His motion for the introduction of foreign troops, 242. Resigns his office, 257. Appointed Paymaster to the Forces, 262.

Francis I. Emperor of Germany, Duke of Lorraine, elected Emperor at Francfort, ii. 82.

Frederick V. King of Denmark, his accession, ii. 137. Loses his Queen, daughter to the King of England, 191.

Frederick, King of Sweden, Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, accedes to

I N D E X.

to the crown on the resignation of his Queen Ulrica, ii. 126. His political situation and deficient authority, 127—134. Forced into a war with Russia, 134. Dies—the amount of his subsidies from England, 191.

Frederick II. King of Prussia, succeeds to the crown on the demise of his father, ii. 19. His unexpected invasion of Silesia, ibid. Gains the battles of Molwitz and Czaſlaw, 25. The entire province of Silesia ceded to him by the treaty of Breslau, ibid. Invades Bohemia, and concludes a treaty with the Emperor, 75. Compelled to evacuate Bohemia with loss, 77. Opens the campaign in Silesia, and defeats the Austrians at Friedburg, 82. and at Sohr, 83. and the Saxons at Kesseldorff, 84. Signs a treaty of peace at Dresden, ibid. Opposes the election of a King of the Romans, 196. Signs a treaty of alliance with the King of Great Britain, 229. Enters the electorate of Saxony, and compels the whole Saxon army to capitulate, 320. Fights an indecisive battle with the Austrians at Lowoschutz, 321. Put under the ban of the Empire, 322. Gains a complete victory over the Prince of Lorraine at Prague, ibid. Defeated by Mareſchal Daun at Kolin, 323. Gains a complete victory over the French at Roſbach, 325. and over the Austrians at Liſſa, ibid. Becomes extremely popular in England, 327. Subsidy treaty signed, 329. Compelled to raise the siege of Olmutz, 333. Defeats the Russians at Zorndorff, ibid. Defeated by Mareſchal Daun at Hochkirchen, 334. Relieves six cities besieged by the enemy, 335, 336. Defeated with great loss by the Russians at Cunerſdorff, 340. In imminent danger of being surrounded, 346. Defeats General Laudohn at Lignitz, 347. Defeats Mareſchal Daun at Torgau, 350. Concludes a separate peace with Russia, 357. Captures the fortress of Schweidnitz, 359. Concludes a peace with the Queen of Hungary at Hubertsburg, 360.

Frederick, Prince of Wales, arrives in England, i. 276. Married to Augusta Princess of Saxe-Gotha, 369. Motion in the House of Commons for settling one hundred thousand pounds per annum on the Prince, 370. Divides in person against the Convention with Spain, ii. 12. His reply to the King's message, 47. Again alienated from the Court, 171. His death, 173.

G

Gages, Count de, succeeds the Duc de Montemar in the command of the Spanish army in Italy, ii. 28. Defeated by M. Traun, at Campo Santo, 29. His march across the Appennines, nines, 32. Defeated by the Austrians at San Lazaro, 34. and Tortona, ibid. Retires to Provence, ibid.

I N D E X.

Genoa, Republic of, treated with flagrant injustice by the Courts of Vienna and London, ii. 66, 67. Joins the confederacy against the Queen of Hungary, 32. 69. City of Genoa taken by the Austrians, 34. Recovered by the heroic bravery of the Genoese, ibid.

George, Prince of Denmark, his death and character, 45.

George I. his accession and descent, i. 87. State of parties, 88. His predilection for the Whigs and Dissenters, 95. Dismisses the Tory Ministers, 97. His remarkable proclamation for convening a Parliament, 98. Purchases of the King of Denmark the Duchies of Bremen and Verden, 131. His alliance with France, ibid. Causes the Swedish ambassador to be arrested, 133. Quarrels with the Czar, 139. Joins in the quadruple alliance, 144. Consequent war with Spain, 148. Concludes a treaty of alliance with Sweden against the Czar, 161. Sends a fleet into the Baltic, 163. Restrains the violent proceedings of the Convocation, 175. Recommends the limitation of the Peerage, in a speech from the throne, 187. and the repeal of the Test Laws to the Parliament of Ireland, 189. Concludes a treaty of peace with Spain, 206. Informs the Parliament of a dangerous conspiracy, 211. Declines to mediate between Spain and the Emperor, 232. Treaty of Hanover, 233. Sends a fleet into the Baltic, 244. to the Mediterranean, 247. to the West Indies, ibid. Revives the Order of Knights of the Bath, 249. His letter to the King of Spain, 253. Orders the Imperial ambassador to depart the kingdom, 259. Preparations for war, ibid. Articles of accommodation signed at Aix-la-Chapelle, 262. The King's death and character, 263.

George II. his accession, 267. Concludes a treaty with Spain at Seville, 280. His angry mention of incendiaries, 288. His remarkable speech from the throne, ibid. Concludes a treaty of peace with the Emperor, 299. Guarantees the Pragmatic Sanction, ibid. Receives the investitures of Bremen and Verden, 324. Extraordinary message to the House of Commons, 345. Sends a fleet to the Tagus for the protection of Portugal, 361. Declares war against Spain, ii. 15. and France, 71. Signs a treaty of neutrality for Hanover, 22. Takes the field in person, 63. His fortunate escape at Dettingen, 64. Concludes a treaty at Worms with the King of Sardinia, 66. His personal sacrifices for the public advantage, 164. Signs a general treaty of peace at Aix-la-Chapelle, 168. Sends hostages to France, 171. Concludes subsidy-treaties with the Electors of Mentz, Bavaria, Saxony, Cologne, and the Elector Palatine,

I N D E X.

- time, 192. and with the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, 228. and Russia, 229. Declares war against France, 256. Concludes a subsidy treaty with Prussia, 329. His spirited memorial to the Diet of the Empire, 366. His death and character, and review of his reign, 376.
- Georgia*, Colony of, settled, i. 325.
- Goertz*, Baron, his machinations against England, i. 133. Arrested by order of the States-General, ibid. Vindicates his conduct, and is set at liberty, 134. His death, 140.
- Godolphin*, Earl of, created Lord High Treasurer, i. 10. Connects himself with the Whigs, 13. His exertions to accomplish the treaty of Union, 34. 42. Scurrilously attacked by Dr. Sacheverel, under the name of Volpone, 61. Removed from his office, 69. Unjust vote of censure passed on him, 70.
- Greece*, island of, reduced by Commodore Keppel, ii. 282.
- Guadeloupe*, island of, conquered by the English, ii. 283.

H

- Halifax*, Earl of, impeached by the Commons, i. 5. Made First Lord Commissioner of the Treasury, 97. His death and character, 168.
- Halifax*, Earl of, his speech against the Hanoverian mercenaries, ii. 114. Town of Halifax founded under his patronage, 182.
- Hanover*, treaty of, i. 233.
- Harcourt*, Lord, succeeds Lord Cowper as Lord Chancellor, i. 69. Removed, 97. His proposition respecting the Earl of Oxford, 173.
- Harcourt*, Earl of, resigns his office as Governor of the Prince of Wales, ii. 176.
- Hardwick*, Earl of, created Lord High Chancellor, i. 249. Removed from his office, ii. 262.
- Hawke*, Admiral, defeats a French squadron commanded by M. Le Tendeur, ii. 165. Supercedes Admiral Byng in the Mediterranean, 249. Makes an unsuccessful attack on Rochefort, 263. Defeats the French fleet off Brest, 287.
- Hawley*, General, defeated by the rebels at Falkirk, ii. 93.
- Henley*, Sir Robert, appointed Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, ii. 262.
- Herring*, Archbishop of Canterbury, his character, i. 381. His candor and catholicism, ii. 167. 383.

Heritable

I N D E X.

- Heritable Jurisdictions*, in Scotland, abolished, ii. 164.
Hindostan, the country and its inhabitants described, ii. 287.
Hoadley, Bishop, his famous sermon, i. 174. His speech against the Test Laws, 179.
Hofier, Admiral, his disastrous expedition to the West Indies, i. 247.
Holt, Lord Chief Justice, his spirited and upright conduct in opposition to the House of Commons, i. 14.
Howe, Lord, his unfortunate death and amiable character, ii. 269.
Hungary, Queen of, succeeds to the hereditary dominions of the House of Austria, ii. 18. Her distresses, 24. Receives immense subsidies from England, 44, 56, 161, 163, &c. Forms an alliance with France, 230. Recals her ambassador from England, 363.

I

- Ireland*, Act declaratory of its dependence on England passed, i. 188.
Jekyl, Sir Joseph, his speech at the trial of Sacheverel, i. 65. He opposes the system of subsidies, 273.
Jenkins, his inhuman treatment by the Captain of a Spanish guarda-costa, ii. 3.
Juan V. King of Portugal, his difference with the Court of Spain, i. 360. His death and character, ii. 187.
Johnson, Sir William, defeats a body of French troops, ii. 223. Gains a second victory, and becomes master of Niagara, 274.

K

- Kennet*, Bishop of Peterborough, his speech against the Test Laws, i. 179. Declaration against the bill for suppressing heresy, 204.
Khevenhuller, Field-Mareschal, his military character and achievements, ii. 24.
King, Sir Peter, one of the managers at the trial of Sacheverel, i. 63. Created Lord King, and Lord High Chancellor, 248.

Lally,

I N D E X.

L

- Lally, M. takes Fort St. David's, ii. 314. Compelled to raise the siege of Tanjore, ibid. Captures the city of Arcot, ibid. Ineffectually besieges the city of Madras, ibid. Defeated by Colonel Coote at Wandewash, 315. Surrenders Pondichery, 317.
- Lansdowne, Lord, committed to the Tower, i. 107. His speech against the bill for repealing the Test Laws, 181.
- Laudohn, Marechal, decides the victory of Cunersdorff, ii. 341. Defeats General Fouquet, and takes Glatz, 346. Lays Breslau in ashes by a bombardment, ibid. Defeated by the King of Prussia at Lignitz, 347. Captures Schweidnitz by a coup-de-main, 354.
- Lawrence, General, his operations in India, ii. 303.
- Legge, Right Hon. Henry Bilson, appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer, ii. 202. Dismissed from his office, 235. Reinstated, 257. A second time dismissed, 260. and again reinstated, 261.
- Lestock, Admiral, his misconduct off Toulon, ii. 139. His miscarriage at Port l'Orient, 162.
- Leopold, Emperor, dies, i. 27.
- Lisbon, city of, destroyed by an earthquake, ii. 239.
- Loudon, Earl of, assembles the loyal Clans in Scotland, ii. 91. Appointed to the chief command in America, 224. His dilatoriness and inactivity, ibid. His unsuccessful expedition against Louisburg, 225. Superfeded in the command by General Abercrombie, 267.
- Louis XIV. his advances for peace rejected, i. 59. Death and character, 128.
- Lutwyche, Mr. his excellent speech against the Roman-Catholic bill, i. 221.

M

- Macclesfield, Earl of, succeeds Lord Cowper as Lord Chancellor, i. 248. Impeached and convicted of misdemeanors in office, ibid.
- Madras, city of, taken by the French, ii. 163. Restored by the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, 170.
- Mahmoud V. Emperor of the Turks, his unexpected elevation to the

I N D E X.

- the throne, i. 280. Attempts to mediate a peace in Christendom, ii. 80.
- Mansfield*, Earl of, his character, ii. 177.
- Mathews*, Admiral, compels the King of Naples to sign a treaty of neutrality, ii. 28. Supports the Corsicans, 137. Threatens the bombardment of Civita Vecchia, 138. Engages the combined fleets off Toulon, ibid. His trial and unjust sentence, 140.
- Mar*, Earl of, proclaims the Pretender in Scotland, i. 107. Escapes to the Continent, 110. Makes application in vain for pardon, 146.
- Marlborough*, Duke of, made Captain-General of the forces of Great Britain, i. 10. and Ambassador Extraordinary to the States-General, ibid. Captures the cities of Venlo, Ruremond, Stevenswart, and Liege, 11. Takes the city of Bonne, 12. His march to the Danube, 22. Victory of Schellenburg, 23. and of Blenheim, ibid. His march to the Moselle, and retreat, 26. Attacks Mareschal Villeroy, and forces the French lines, 27. Victory at Ramillies, and conquest of the Spanish Netherlands, 28. Battle of Oudenard, and capture of Lisse, 48. and of Tournay, 49. Battle of Malplaquet, and capture of Mons, 50. Towns of Douay, St. Venant, &c. taken, ibid. Appears for the last time at the head of the grand army, 52. Penetrates the French lines at Arleux, 53. Takes Bouchaine, 54. Divested of his civil and military employments, ibid. Inquiry instituted by the House of Commons into his conduct, 71. Censured, ibid. Prosecuted, ibid. Reinstated in his offices, and command of the army, by King George, 97. His death and character, 198.
- Mecklenburg*, affairs of, 162.
- Meer-Jaffier-Ali-Khan*, his conspiracy against Surajah Doula, ii. 310. His advancement to the Muinud, 312.
- Methodism*, rise of, i. 363.
- Methuen*, Sir Paul, appointed Secretary State, but resigns in disgust, i. 136. Opposes the excise bill, 330.
- Militia* bill, ii. 361.
- Minorea*, island of, invaded and captured by the French, ii. 250.
- Molesworth*, Lord, his speech against the alliance with Sweden, i. 206. His memorable observation repeated, 289.
- Monckton*, Colonel, his successful exertions in Nova Scotia, ii. 227. Gallantry at Quebec, 279.
- Montcalm*, Monsieur de, makes himself master of Oswego, ii. 225.

INDEX.

of Fort William-Henry, 226. Repulses the English at Montmorenci, 275. Defeated and slain at the battle of Quebec, 279.
Mordaunt, Sir John, his unfortunate expedition to Rochefort, ii. 263. His trial and unexpected acquittal, 265.
Murray, General, appointed to the Government of Quebec, 280. His gallant defence of that city, ibid. He co-operates with General Amherst in the reduction of Montreal, 281.

N

Newcastle, Duke of, Secretary of State, his character, i. 268. His impenetrable secrecy, 383. Resigns and is reinstated, ii. 160. Presents a regency bill to Parliament, 188. His dislike to "new-fangled things," ibid. Advanced to the office of First Commissioner of the Treasury, 202. His incapacity for government, ibid. Permits the barbarous execution of Dr. Cameron, 203. His weak and haughty treatment of the Parliament of Ireland, ibid. His empty and artificial professions, 237. His political portrait, 239. His eager vindication of his own indiscretion and misconduct, 252. Resigns, 257. Reinstated in consequence of a coalition of parties, 261.
Nottingham, Earl of, opposes the Peace of Utrecht, i. 72. Revives the occasional conformity bill, 73. Constituted President of the Council, 97. Resigns, and opposes the septennial bill, 116. Defends the doctrine of the Trinity against Professor Whiston, 201. Brings in a bill for the suppression of heresy and blasphemy, 202. Ridiculed by Swift, 205.

O

Occasional Conformity Bill passed by the Commons, and rejected by the Lords, i. 12. Again passed and rejected, 13. Passes into a law, 73. Repealed, 183.
Onslow, Arthur, Esq. chosen Speaker of the House of Commons, i. 273. His animated address to the King, ii. 243.
Orange, Prince of, marries the Princess-Royal of England, i. 356. His character, ibid. Declared Hereditary Stadtholder, ii. 98. His death, 192.
Orleans, Duke of, appointed Regent of France, i. 130. Enters into an alliance with the King of England, 131. Dies—his character, 230.

Ormond,

I N D E X.

Ormond, Duke of, fails in his attempt on Cadiz, but takes Vigo, i. 11. Succeeds the Duke of Marlborough in the command of the army, 70. Co-operates with Prince Eugene, in the siege of Quesnoy, 75. Proclaims an armistice with France, ibid. Departs for England, ibid. Impeached of high treason, 101. Withdraws to the Continent, 102. Enters into the service of the Pretender, 103. Appointed to the command of an armament for the invasion of Great Britain, 158.

Oxford, Robert Harley. Earl of, dismissed from his office of Secretary of State, i. 58. Appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer, 69. and Lord High Treasurer, 71. His character, 78. Removed from his office, 83. Impeached of high treason, 101. His defence and commitment, 104. His acquittal, 173.

P

Palms, M. his insolent memorial, i. 255. Ordered to depart the kingdom, 259.

Peerage Bill introduced, i. 185. and rejected, 186.

Pelham, Right Hon. Henry, Secretary at War, his character, i. 268. Appointed First Commissioner of the Treasury, and Chancellor of the Exchequer, ii. 141. Reduces the interest of the public funds, 183. Patronizes the Jew-naturalization bill, 199. which is repealed, 200. His death, ibid. Review of his administration, ibid.

Peter the Great, his resentment against the King of England, i. 139. 163. His death and character, 242.

Peter II. Emperor of Russia, his accession and death, i. 280.

Peter III. Emperor of Russia, his deposition and death, ii. 357, 358.

Peterborough, Earl of, conquers the kingdom of Valencia, i. 30. Resigns his commission in anger, 31. Opposes the bill for religious persecution, 204.

Philip V. King of Spain, resigns and resumes his crown, i. 227, 228. His death, ii. 165.

Philip, Infant of Spain, enters Savoy, and takes Chamberri, ii. 28. Parma and Placentia ceded to him, 169.

Pitt, Right Hon. William, his speech in support of the motion of inquiry into the conduct of Sir Robert Walpole, i. 51. His speech in support of the motion for discharging the Hanoverian mercenaries, 108. Appointed Paymaster of the Forces,

I N D E X.

141. His political character, 178. His observations on the Mutiny Bill, 181. On the right of search, 186. Vehemently opposes a war on the Continent, and is dismissed from his office, 234. Appointed Secretary of State, 257. Delivers a royal message, which he does not support, 258. A second time dismissed, 260. and again reinstated, 261. His vigorous exertions, 263. Engages with ardor in the German war, 326. His reasons, ibid.

Porteous, Captain, his remarkable execution, i. 365.

Pragmatic Sanction, edict so called, i. 231.

Pulteney, Right Hon. William, resigns his office as Secretary at War, i. 136. Openly declares against the political system of the Court, ibid. Opposes the alienation of the Sinking Fund, 260. Inveighs against grants for secret service, 275. Exposes the inconsistent politics of the Court, 312. His name struck out of the list of Privy Counsellors, 319. His retrospective view of the conduct of Sir Robert Walpole, ii. 39. Created Earl of Bath, and loses the public confidence, 48. Opposes the repeal of the Septennial Act, 59.

Q

Quadruple alliance concluded, i. 144.

Quakers, act passed in their favour, i. 209.

Qualification-act, of Queen Anne, remarks upon it, ii. 372.

Quebec, city of, surrenders to the English, ii. 279.

R

Raymond, Sir Robert, his speech against the Septennial Bill, i. 123.

Riot act passed, i. 168.

Ripperda, Duke of, his character and political projects, i. 239.

Robinson, Sir Thomas, appointed Secretary of State, ii. 202. Delivers a message from the King, 219. Resigns his office, 236.

Rodney, Admiral Sir George, bombards the town of Havre-de-Grace, ii. 285.

Rooke,

I N D E X

Rooke, Admiral Sir George, captures the Spanish flota in the port of Vigo, i. 11. Surprizes the fortress of Gibraltar, 26.

S

Sacheverel, Dr. his impeachment and its consequences, 60. 68.

Sandys, Mr. revives the Place Bill, i. 344. His motion for the removal of Sir Robert Walpole, ii. 39. Appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer, 48. Opposes the repeal of the Septennial Act, 50. Opposes the Place Bill, 61. Resigns his office, and is created a Peer, 141.

Sardinia, island of, conquered by Admiral Sir John Leake, i. 49. Ceded to the Emperor by the treaty of Al-Rastadt, 77. Conquered by Spain, 143. Re-conquered by the Imperialists and English, 158. Transferred to the House of Savoy in exchange for Sicily, 145. 160.

Saxe, Marechal, appointed commander in chief of the French army in Flanders, ii. 73. Captures Menin, Ypres, and Furnes, ibid. Invests Tournay, 87. Defeats the allies at Fontenoy, and reduces the greater part of Flanders, 88. Captures Antwerp and Mons, &c. 96. Defeats the allies at Roucoux, 96. Invades Dutch Flanders, 98. Defeats the allies at Laffeldt, 99. Detaches Count Lowendahl, who takes Bergen-op-Zoom, 101. Invests the city of Maastricht, 102.

Scarborough, Earl of, opposes a dangerous motion of the Duke of Marlborough, i. 343. His character, ibid.

Seaton, Mr. of Pitmeden, his speech in favour of the Union, i. 38.

Security, act of, passed by the Scottish Parliament, i. 33.

Senegal, settlement of, reduced by Commodore Marth, ii. 282.

Septennial act passed, i. 116. Attempt to repeal it, 338.

Seville, treaty of, i. 280.

Sherlock, Bishop of Bangor, his remarkable declaration respecting regal influence, i. 297.

Shippen, William, his speech against the Septennial Bill, i. 118. Against standing armies, 151. Committed to the Tower, 154. His unbroken spirit, 156. Opposes the increase of the Civil List revenue, 271. Opposes the farther continuance of the standing army, 327. His speech against unlimited votes of

I N D E X

- credit, 346. His opposition to continental subsidies and connections, ii. 44, 45.
- Sleswick*, Duchy of, guaranteed by Hanover to Denmark, i. 131. by Great Britain, 161. by the Emperor and Russia, with remarkable attendant circumstances, 306.
- South Sea* bill introduced and passed, i. 190. Its fatal consequences, 192.
- Su-rajah-Doula*, his character and barbarous conduct, ii. 305. His defeat and death, 313.
- Stair*, Earl of, appointed ambassador to France, i. 131. Recalled, 189. His spirited vindication of his conduct, 190. Appointed Generalissimo of the continental army, ii. 58. Gains the battle of Dettingen, 65. Resigns, 70. His character, ibid. Reinstated in his offices, 91.
- Stanislaus*, King of Poland, besieged in Dantzic, i. 333.
- Stanhope*, General, conquers the island of Minorca, i. 49. Routs the Spanish cavalry at Almanara, 51. Surrounded and compelled to capitulate at Brihuega, 52. Appointed Manager at the impeachment of Sacheverel, 63. Advanced to the post of Secretary of State, 97. Impeaches the Duke of Ormond of high treason, 101. Delivers a remarkable message from the King, 134. Made First Lord of the Treasury, which he soon resigns, and is created an Earl, 172. Introduces a bill for the repeal of the occasional conformity, test, and schism acts, 176. Another for the limitation of the peerage, 186. His death, 195.
- Steinborst*, Lordship of, difference between Denmark and Hanover respecting it, i. 382.
- Strafford*, Earl of, demands of the States the performance of their guarantee, i. 85. His impeachment, 101.
- Sunderland*, Earl of, removed from his office of Secretary of State, i. 69. Appointed to the Government of Ireland, 97. Succeeds Mr. Methuen as Secretary of State, 172. Appointed First Lord of the Treasury, ibid. Compelled to a precipitate and disgraceful resignation, 193. His death and character, 198.
- Swift*, Dean of St. Patrick, his insolence, i. 278. His declaration concerning annual parliaments, ii. 152.
- Sydenham*, Mr. his speech in support of the motion for restoring annual parliaments, ii. 148.

I N D E X.

T

- Talbot*, Lord, appointed Lord High Chancellor, i. 249. His death and character, ibid.
- Tallard*, Marechal, defeated and taken prisoner at Blenheim, i. 25.
- Townshend*, Viscount, made Secretary of State, i. 97. Appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, but dismissed from his office, 136. Appointed a second time Secretary of State, 195. His character, 267.
- Traun*, Marechal, gains the battle of Campo Santo, ii. 29. His able conduct in Alsace, 74. and Bohemia, 77.

U

- Unigenitus*, bull so called, its origin and consequences, ii. 207.

V

- Vendome*, Duc de, opposes with reputation the Duke of Marlborough in Flanders, i. 46. Defeated at Oudenarde, 48. Appointed to the chief command in Spain, and recovers Catalonia and Arragon, 52.
- Vernon*, Admiral, takes Porto Bello with six ships only, ii. 16. Fails in his attempt on Carthage, 17.
- Victor Amadeus*, King of Sardinia, exchanges Sicily for Sardinia, i. 147. Resigns his crown, 280. He attempts in vain to resume it, 325.
- Villars*, Marechal, defeated at Malplaquet, i. 50. His lines penetrated by the allied army, 54. Defeats the allies at Denain, 75. Takes Marchiennes, Douay, &c. ibid. Assumes the command of the army in Lombardy, 335. Expels the Imperialists from the Milanese, ibid. Dies, ibid.
- Villeroi*, Marechal, defeated at Ramilies, i. 28.

W

- Wake*, Archbishop of Canterbury, his declaration at the trial of Sacheverel, i. 65. His opposition to the repeal of the Test laws, laws, &c. 177. Moves for the commitment of the bill against heresy, 202. His death and character, 381.

I N D E X.

Walpole, Sir Robert, appointed Manager at the trial of Sacheverel, i. 63. Chosen Chairman of the Secret Committee, 100. Impeaches Lord Bolingbroke of high treason, ibid. Succeeds the Earl of Hallifax as First Commissioner of the Treasury, but resigns in disgust, 134. 168. Declaims against standing armies, 151. against the continental politics of the Court, 156. Frames the project of the sinking fund, 168. Opposes the bill for limiting the Peerage, 186. Declares against the South Sea bill, 192. Reinstated in his office, 195. Moves for a subsidy to Sweden, 206. Discloses to the House of Commons the particulars of a conspiracy against the Government, 212. Introduces a penal bill against the Roman Catholics, 220. His favor with the new King, 267. Proposes an addition to the civil list, 271. Presents a bill to Parliament against foreign loans, 268. His extraordinary defence of the measures recommended from the throne, 293. His political character delineated, 320, 321. His bill for the revival of the salt duties, 323. His direct alienation of the sinking fund, 328. His excise bill, 329. Opposes, with singular sagacity, the dangerous motion of Lord Morpeth, 340. Delivers a message from the King, requiring an extraordinary vote of credit, 345. Opposes the repeal of the Test, 362. His motives, ibid. His reluctance to enter into a war with Spain, ii. 3. His masterly vindication of the Convention signed at the Pardo, 6. Acts with vigor on the commencement of the war, 15. His spirited reply to the motion for his removal from office, 42. Is left in a minority in the new Parliament, and in danger of impeachment, 46. Resigns his office, and is created Earl of Orford, 47. Parliamentary inquiry into his conduct, 50. Review of his administration, 53. His death, 158.

Walpole, Horace, his speech in defence of the treaty of Hanover, i. 234. Defends the treaty of Vienna, 314. His singular assertion respecting the army, 327. His speech in defence of votes of credit, 351. Moves for a subsidy to Denmark, 358. Known under the appellation of Balance-master, ibid.

Washington, Major, his spirited message to the French governor on the Ohio, ii. 215. Defends with vigor a post on the Ohio, 218.

Watson, Admiral, his naval operations, death and character, ii. 308—316.

Wharton, Duke of, his malicious reflection on Lord Stanhope, 194. Opposes the heresy bill, 202. Death and character, 203.

William,

I N D E X.

William, King, concludes with France the first and second treaties of partition, i. 3, 4. Revives the grand alliance, 6. Summons a parliament, ibid. His speech, ibid. His death and character, 8.

Wolfe, General, distinguishes himself at the siege of Louisburg, ii. 271. Commands the expedition against Quebec, 274. Lands his forces on the Isle of Orleans, ibid. Attacks the enemy at the falls of Montmorenci, and is repulsed, 275. His apparently insurmountable embarrassments, 276. His daring and successful attempt to gain the heights of Abraham, 277. Forces M. de Montcalm to a general engagement 278. His heroic death in the moment of victory, ibid.

Worms, treaty of, 66. Its abominable injustice, ibid.

Wyndham, Sir William, reprimanded by the Speaker, 99. Committed to the Tower, 107. His observations on the state of affairs, 251. He opposes the alienation of the sinking fund, 328. His memorable speech on the motion for repealing the septennial act, 338. His remarks on the Convention of Madrid, ii. 11. His death and character, 12.

END OF THE SECOND VOLUME.

